A very interesting lad of about fifteen years, with a very expressive countenance, decked with a pair of bright hexel eyes, beld in his hand a small gold looket, which was attached to a gold chain, one end of which was fastened to his watch and the other nearly hooked in his button hole. Several of the boys were showy chains, with rich, heavy charms, and han feome kers, and had evidently been tessing him about his very modest fewelry. The first words reaching my deredistinctly "All your watches, chains and charms put together would not buy this one

"That darling little fairy with brown eyes and silken bair, that you used to take out on the green a year are last summer !" inquired one of the boys with a tender tone to his voice.

"Yes, I remember her, but I have n seen her for some time." "Hash, Tommy," whispered the first speaker, with a significent look and Johnny resumed his story with a sigh. " Yes, that was my little sister Mamie, the only sister I ever had. She died last March a year ago and I tell you boys, it was a lonesome summer for us all."

"I should say so," joined in Tommy She looked like such a good natured little thing. She was as good as a boy for fun." " No cry-baby about her," added another and Johany gave him a grateful look as he went on with his story : "This was her locket, and this is her picture in it. I saved up my money and bought it for her and mamma had her picture taken and put in. She knew that she was going to die for nearly two days, and she divided her things among us. It was so wonderful how she knew every body, and everything she had." Here Johnny ceased speaking for a few moments. The other boys waited in sympathetic silence as he turned the locket over slowly, opening it and casting a glance at the beautiful little face it contained, until he had conquered the pain sufficiently to begin again in a milder voice : "The last thing that she everdid, was to take this locket from the little strand of coral beads that encircled her lovely neck, and give it to me. With little gaspe for breath she asked me, Will you wear this always on your little gold chain? I thought
