Practical Wisdom.

He who learns by experience, both sweet and bitter, touches the secret spring of success. He can turn whatever knowledge he possesses to the best account, while without this practical wisdom stores of knowledge may be wasted.

This power, like every other, may be cultivated. It strengthens by exercise, it withers by disuse. Those who are naturally deficient in it may improve by carefully directing their thoughts to definite ends to be gained, by calling up to frequent remembrance their past mistakes, follies, and faults, and by reviewing with equal care the reverse and brighter side of their experience.

It is in this way the discipline of daily life comes to be our most valuable friend; it is in this way the past may be made a safe guide and an inspiring influence to the future.
