The Young Folks.

UNDER THE BRIDAL MOON.

On the blue shield of yon transcendent heaven
To-night I saw the monogram of June,
Fleshed with the faintest rose of virgin even,
The silver thread of a young bridal moon!
Beneath the everlasting hills that lifted
Their solemn shafts of towering oak and pine,
Through vails of luminous haze by soft winds drifted,
The earth lay like a vast hymenial shrine!

Far off the fleet white stars in cloudless splendor
Lit up the purple-vailed summer skies;
And every sigh of eve, supremely tender,
Was freighted with the balms of paradise,
Where, cloistered mid perpetual flowery blooms,
Two lovers walked, in sanctuary sweet,
While June poured her infinitude of roses
About their heedless feet!

I heard the silvery piping and rejoicing
Of winds and waves, that watered their delight
As if the very soul of song were voicing
The measureless rapture of the summer night!
While—some unreached, diviner bliss foretelling—
Through all the starry vailed space of even
A vague, melodious murmur, softly swelling,
Rose like the marriage hymn of Earth and Heaven!
