Just a mile to the river she was thinking, "one little mile—and once more."

Out upon the soft summer there came from the window behind her a hollow cough.

As he heard it, her face softened, and a rash of tears filled her eyes.

"I could not die, and leave him!" Ah!

He will not die, the boy is bitter, but I will walk over the one, and drain the other, for his sake—only for his sake.

It will be only for a little while, and then there is still the river.

She was not yet nineteen, and the way she had to lead to the church; the cup to be drained, her marriage, and for her wedding portion who was meditating.

Does it seem exaggerated? I will tell you her story, and you may judge.

Her father, Paul Grierson, had been a successful man, about six years ago.

He had been a successful lawyer, and had been to him, and upon a ground-work of mutual knowledge, and upon a groundwork of a fair salary of medical practice and painting.

Without being rich, but plenty, and they had travelled far and wide with a company he had loved from a baby, his father's pupil and namesake, Paul Grierson Hall, a distant cousin.

When May was seventeen, and Paul five years older, the young artist joined an exploring expedition to make sketches, and the trio separated. That was the first heart-break. They were all in Paris when the parting came, but a few months later Mr. Grierson's health began to fail, and he became hopeless.

He was then twenty, the boy was ten.

He had been a successful painter, and had sold his pictures to the best galleries in Europe, and had been to America, and had painted in New York, Boston, and Montreal, and had been to England, and had painted in London, and had been to Paris, and had painted in Paris, and had
