The Young Folks.

ONE AND ONE.

Two little girls are better than one,
Two little boys can double the fun.
Two little birds can build a fine nest,
Two little dogs can have a great treat.
Two little turtles make a nice span,
Two little pebbles has my little stone,
Two little gins to open and close,
Two little hands to hold and nose.
Two little fingers, two little toes,
Two little lips and one little chin.
Two little cheeks with a rose about it,
Two little arms that always stretch.
Two little legs run up all day long,
Two little prairies over my darling sea.
Twice does he kiss by side each day,
Twice does he kiss me, and twice brown,
Two little eyes, two little heads,
And two little hands guard him in bed.
Out at the foot and one at the head.

THE PANSY.

Pansy? — Here they grow,
From blue to deeper blue, in midst of each
A golden daisy like a glistening star,
More slender, longer than a silver crown.

The sun has never seen them since,
Here happy, coming early, lingering late,
Because they were so good.

Robert Browning.

We have found pansies smiling still after the frost and snow of November, holding bravely the last place in the floral calendar of the year. We do not marvel that it is so loved and cherished, and that the poets of all time have chanted its praise.

No other flower has had such a variety of names before it, but the application of heart's ease (one of the most common) properly belongs to the wall flower, owing to its cordial properties.

Bouyan in the "Pilgrim's Progress" describes the Shepherd boy in the Valley of Homiliation as wearing "that heart's ease in his bosom." Robert Herrick, more than two centuries ago, thus explained: "How

Pansies or Heart's-ease (Same First.)

Frolics, frolics, what were we,
Our loves, our living, our care,

Being here, there, and there,
Ban for sweethearts mad and dead.

Loves, in pity of their care,
And heart's ease, and trifling gales,

For their pastimes here spent hours,
Gave them heart's ease turned to frowns.

The French name, pensee — thought — is a carrant for Cupid's pathetic words:

"And there is penser, that's for thoughts."

This designation probably came from the flower dropping on its slender stalk, as in thoughtfulness.

Shakespeare also tells us in "Midsummer Night's Dream" how it received its popular name:

"... And mark'd I where the boar of sport fell,
It fell upon a little Western bower
Before which white, now purple, was his home;

And mark'd I where the boar of sport fell,
I mark'd it well, to inform the fairies.

And mark'd I where the boar of sport fell,
I mark'd it well, to inform the fairies.

And mark'd I where the boar of sport fell,
I mark'd it well, to inform the fairies.

The Italian designate is "Bianchella," the little flower. In various country places it is termed, "Three pretty faces under one hood." Call it "Calliope," "Ladies delight," "Jump up and kiss me quick," "Kiss me behind the garden gate," and "Cuddle me to you." Hallidays quotes from an old manuscript which furnishes this list of names: "Violets, trictrac, heart'sease, herba trinitatis, herba cælestis, panacea, love in idleness."

The pansy was one of Leigh Hunt's favorite flowers, and he called it "sparkler," most frequent mention of it in his poems. Here is one of his tributes:

As proud as all of them
But the pansy, who is modest,
Heart's ease, like a gallant bold
In his coat of purple and gold.

There is a pretty legend famous in French and German children, which is probably of French origin, as one of the names in France for the pansy is "the stepmother." The fable is that the pansy represents a family. It has five petals and three stamens; the three petals are bright yellow, while the two others are pale. The secret of the pansy's beauty is that it is a composite of three families.
