AN UNFORTUNATE TONGUE.

"What kind of a man is your cousing Abe?" inquired one of Farmer Willet's boarders of that mild-featured old man "He doesn't seem to be very popular in the neighborhood." "Well, now, Abe aint 'xackly pop'lar," admitted Mr. Willet. dunno how 'tis, but scoms 's of he bed tremenjous fac'lty fer settin' folks on aidge It ain't his intentions to do it, but it doc appear that if over there's a thing that had oughter be kind of glossed over an' gon 'round easy, Abe he lays it right open, an' bears down heavy on't.

"I don't cal'late," continued Mr. Willet tapping his fingers meditatively on the broad arms of his old rooking-chair, "that there's a single one of the mothers in this township but what's got somethin' laid up agin Abe; remarks 't he's made about the children, an' so on, ye bee.

"I presume t' say Mis' Deac'n Jenk never'll forgive him fer tellin' her, when little 'Zek'el wa'n't but a year old, that he reckoned his nose was goin' to favor his pa's. You've seen a deac'n aint ye? Well, that wa'n't a real encour'gin' thing er her to bear, though the deac'n's jest as good a man as over lived. "An' so 'tie with 'most everythin' an everybody. Somobody was askin' m onco-'twas a school-teacher that come here, an' Abe had angered her, sayin' how he was all took aback when he heerd how much younger she was 'n she appeared to be; well, she asked me, kind of nippin', "Bless ye, ma'am,' says I, 'there ain't | The practice then (and for aught I know no "circle," family nor otherwise, where Abe is! He'd scatter the biggest circle of folks 't ever I see, an' not mean to, nother.' . "Abe's a smart man," said Mr. Willet, as he rose in slow, rheumatic fashion, "but I've figgered on his case consider'ble, off'n on; an' it appears t'-mo-'twould be better fer him if he was a plumb cejot, or leastways jest knew his alphabet. When a man's born with a tongue like Abe's, I tell ye folks'd ruther a long sight hear him say his 'a, b, abe' th'n run any resks !"

WHY SHE STAYED.

A lady who had reached the time of lift when she began to resent every birthday as a personal affront was attending a sewing-circle at the parsonage one day when the cry went up that there was a mouse in the room. Every lady in the room, except one, fled screaming. She remained in her chair, as pale as death.

Hearing the nproar, the pastor, who was in his study, came in to see what was the matter.

"It's a m-m-mousel" the pale lady gasped.

"Indeed! And why didn't you run with the rest?" Aren's you afraid of mice?" "I am mortally afraid of them !" "Then why, please, did you stay in the

NOT TO BE BOUGHT.

The results of using big words in convorsation with people who do not under stand them are often laughable. -In Boston there is a lady of literary aspirations who talks even with her servants in a sort of literary way.
