the girls of Harbord Street School, that Jessie Rankin did not half know what's good time was She had a lively quartette of younger brothers and sisters, and every one them looked to Jessie, as the big, wien, elder slater, who, of course, must know all about work.

On Saturday, it was Jessin who scrubbed the kitchen floor, and baked the cookies, and she actually had t wash dishes and make beds, every day of her life. Nor were the younger members of the Rankin clas guite exempt from toll. Rvery morning Rdwin helped Jessie to wash the brookfast dishes, while James and Fred and little Ruth tidied up the dining-room and cleaned the bed-room lambs. noon every child of this well regulated house attacked the dinner dishes, and again at supper time, "many hands made light work." Hut on Jessie's young shoulders there rested what her schoolmates adjudged to be quite hurdensome share of work. "It is just ridiculous!" said Nellie Perkins. "However can a girl have any sort of a good time, who is always just can't be replaced." laving at bonse P'

"Besides," continued (irace Hulmes "look at Jessie's limits. They are always red, and if she was not so persistent with her music, she would never make any sort of beadway." Now, although Jessie Rankin beard bits of this frequent criticism, was not the girl to court pity. And thus it came about, that to all save her own home folk, she maintained, on the subject of her home duties, an attitude of lofty indifference. "But I declare, mother," she would ften complain J'things are not even In this old world. I know you are not strong, and you give us all the good time you can, but there is not

Cousin May, with a twinkle in her eye, "that a freckle only spoke once, and then it said that it never was tnown to light on a 'din' skin?" After Jessie had come to understand that "din" was Scotch for dark and that her fair, clear skin was hing praised, she laughed in a pleased bearty fashion. And then it was that Cousin May made a remark which this page : young, impressionable girl never for-

"Lapsie," said abr. "I want you to treasure always these fine, sensible well-kept hands of yours. Long after the freckles have all gone, the brawn and muscle will abide, and this is the stuff that counts in life. It stands for capability and force, and my-exper lence with scores of girls has taught me that the girl who amounts to some thing is not generally the one with the white, lily hands, Most times it i the girl who owns a pair of common sense, usable bands, the kind that have learned to work, who wine the

While this most wholesome message was ringing in Jessie Rankin's young ears, poor, tired Mrs. Perkins sickened and died. The first thing people said was that slaving for her children had killed her and in the next breath they added that Susie and Nellie were big mough to keep house. And so indeed they were, but be cause they knew not how to boil potato, or darn a stocking, they made but a sorry attempt as housekeepers. The younger children soon began to appear in tattered, disheveled garments, and even on Sundays, the one time immaculate Perkins family was seen in attire far from tidy.

Now, of course, people commented some pitifully and some caustically upon this very evident change; but remained for Jessie Rankin, one school day, to place her finger upon the real crux of the situation. "According to my way of thinking

PATRIOTICM. The religion of patriotism may sound blasphenious to some cars. but that patriotism be less than religion is the conception which has prepared the way for the elvie corruption of the last decside. We are to serve the state not only with our bodies as soldiers and policemen nor even with our bottes alone as voters, but, as Thoront has put it, with our consciences as citizens. Ours ought to be a religion of pairlotlaw, for America is not a land phose for a country por a bec ple, but a hope, a vision, an ideal.
