-----MONUMENTS TO MEN OF LETTERS A movement has been started in Byracuse, New York, for the erectlos of a monument to Edward. N. West

cott, the author of David Harum .-Dally Paper. Not yet. Wait fifty years and then see. For the present David Harum all the public monument Mr. Westcott needs. He is famous as the author of a best seller, and doubtless there ar these in Syracuse who are proud, or his Tame and would like to connect his city with it by permanent ties But Westoott would have laughed at the idea of his being a great man of letters. So would Hunyan have laughed, but no one would laugh at a monument to Bunyan now, and perhaps [another generation a monument to how David Harum wears. Monuments, as a rule, are erected to persons whom the public cannot forget, rather than to persons whom it is in danger of forgetting. There is a monument to Longfellow in Portland, a very awful and amusing giant bust of Irving in Bryant Park in New York, and here and elsewhere various other metallic testimonials of efficiency in literary composition, but the only one we can recall that seems to b doing any good to the St.-Gaudens monument to Stevenson in San Francleoo. Writers are the very last people who need monument. They have exceptional means of keeping their memories green, and when they do not themselves attend to that duty it i usually proper for posterity also to

MAGPIN AS THINVES' ACCOM-

Bix thieves and a magple have been run in by the Paris police. The bird true to tta instinct, was an active member of the gang. It did not pur-'loin on its own account but its bein was invaluable. -The-six-thieves, all under sixteen, chose a simple-minded tradesman, and entered his shop. The bird was perched on the wrist of one of the boys, and did tricks, bowed, danced and chattered. The ingenuous shopkeeper was amused. Suddenly the magple flow up and perched ness the celling out of reach. The boys and the shopkeeper started hunting for the bird-not all the boys, however, for one of them stopped behind, near the till and cuptled it. HIGH PURPOSE NOT ENOUGH

It is not enough to have the right aim or purpose in what we do. We may have the aim or purpose of Christ bimself, yet do great harm, Our methods as well as our aim, must be right. When we would be used Christ, to bring others to Him, for example, it is possible actually to misrepresent Him by criticising or condemning those whom we would reach, or by trying to crowd them into decision that must be made in free will or not at all, and thus to antagonize them and drive them farther away from Christ than ever. Our purpose is good, but our methods defeat it. This does not mean that we should therefore abandon our efforts at soul winning; for the worst, mistake in that work is not the mistake of doing it wrongly, but of not doing it at all, It does mean, however, that we should ask our Lord Himself to show us how to do His will, quite as much as what aright "what our hands find to do."

A RASELESS CHARGE

A precentor of the old type led the singing in a little Northern kick with more vigor than melody. An old lady who contributed largely to the church finances called at the manes and ex plained than she gould not endure the precentor any longer. SCOTT AT ARBOTSFORD

This is a notable year in the blatory of Abbotsford, for it is the centenary of Bir Walter Scott's entry into possession of the lands ever afterwards closely associated with his name. On May 12, 1811, he wrote to his publisher, James Ballantyne, that he had "resolved to purchase a piece of ground ufficient for a cottage and a few fields." That first purchase, which cost £1,000, was a wretched farm by the riverside, the house, says Lock hart, "small and poor, with a common kallyard on one flack and a staring barn on the other, while in front-appeared a filthy pond covered with ducks and duckwood, from which the whole tenement had derived the un harmonious designation of Clarty

Scott spent £30,000 in extending and beautifying the estate, and in Abbotaford amid the music so delicious to his ear, "the gentle ripple of the Tweed Westcott may seem more spitable over its pubbles," he breathed his last on the sunny afternoon of September
