_____ PROM BILENT LIPS

When the children went to live at grandfather's, while father and mother were abroad, they blew through the bouse like a gust of wind. Doors slammed from morning until night in spite of all Aunt Jean could do. I)ear old grandfather, almost wholly deaf, sat back in his corner and watched the frolicking with gentle eyes: but when the volces grew sharp, as they sometimes did, he winced, and when the doors banged, he groaned softly. Oge day he called thirteen-year-old

Betty to him. "My dear," he said, "did you ever know that as an old person's care grow deaf they sometimes grow very sensitive to noise? Do you know that I makes a pain through my head when you talk loud or slam that door?"

"I should say I didn't know it, you dear grandpa!" orled impulsive Betty, perching on the arm of his chair and klesing his obeek as she spoke.

"I was sure you didn't, child," he went on, "but that isn't zil. Hometimes, when we don't bear so much we see more. I've been watching you since you came, Betty, and I want to ask you to do me a favor. I want you to form a habit as you are going from one room to another through the day, of asking yourself, 'How will this affect others ? "

Betty had begun to fidget. Brother Rob was backoning from outside the window, but grandfather still held her

"I don't expect to stay here very long, dear," he was saying, "but after I am gone my silent lips may speak to you better than I can to-day, and you may remember what I say."

But the very next morning as Notly was starting for an all-day plonic, and mischievous Rob had hidden her lunch basket, there was a loud'al tercation that made grandfather pu bis hands to his head and green. "Grandfather is trying to speak to you, Betty," said Aunt Jean. "Yee, I heard him, but I can't help how it does affect others this time. It's all Rob's fault. Give me my basket, sir! You're making me late! There, you'd hetter !"

Seising the basket, Betty rushed out of the house and down the steps, while the door slammed sharply behind her. When she came back late that after noot, there was a strange bush about the house. The other children drew ber in close to grandfather's empty chair, and told her in awed whispers how he had fallen asleep there a few hours before, never to wake again. The frightened girl listened, but not a word passed her lips until Aunt Jean came, and putting both arms around her, led her to the bed where grand- for price.
