The banquet was held in the school men and the programme which followed was given in the auditorium. The tables were laden with an abundance of good things. The members of the primary and intermediate classes were first served, then the older scholare and the mothers with their bables. The musical and literary feature of the evening was unique and enjoyable. Each class in the school was given the temponsibility of providing one or more numbers. The result was gratifying and satisfactory. The programme was

Enthusiasm in Advertising

RUTH we must have in advertising. The day of the fakir is short. But enthusiasm is more vital to the success of the advertising man than it is to the solicitor or travelling salesman. The salesman has the advantage of the hearty handshake, the ingratiating smile, and the voice-which he can modulate to suit the mood of his prospect.

UT THE AD-WRITER whose word reaches so many men out of the reach of the salesman, is handicapped by the lack of the advantages of personal contact. Ink and white paper must do for the ad-writer what the voice, the handskake, the smile, and the man-toman look do for the salesman. ' His space is limited and the type cold and inanimite.

NTHUSIASM is necessary to give the ink and the type the human touch, the personal appeal which will grip the attention and drive home the logic of the argument. Without enthusiasm the ink is colorless, the type gray and cold, the argument without force.

IF YOUR GOODS won't warrant enthusiasm they won't warrant advertising, and vice versa. Did you ever know of anyone who convinced many men to his way of thinking who was not an enthusi
