"You know the value of tips in the United States." writes a man from Prague, who visited this country for the first time two years ago, "and you are more liberal than we are in the respect, but such a thing as tipping a rallway conductor is not known to the tourist in America. Here in Ametria the custom is so well established that the refusal of a conductor on a linchs-Innabruck train to accept a thinkgold ed to ride alone in a compartment has caused unusual comment. The title 'White Raven' was conferred on the conductor, who emphasized his displeasure at being tempted by baving the passenger summoned before magistrate on the charge of attempted bribery. Do not let that trouble you, however, when you come here, because the Upping malefactor was discharged, and the magistrate's contemptuous look at the conductor indi-

One can iningine therefore the sort of grim amusement he felt in telling this story and he often told it to his friends: "I had delivered a lecture in a rural town out west, and several of my anditors were accosting me with expressions of their satisfaction. One person lu particular was effusively eager, saying: 'I am delighted, Mr. Taylor, to make your acquaintance. I have read everything you have ever written and have greatly enjoyed it all.' This was pleasant to bear, and, as be grasped my hand with evident friendship, L.po. sponded with a request for his opinion of my poetry. Where the Beautiful Dye is Derived and How It is Manufactured. Indigo, the most besutiful blve dye in the world is derived from a species of plant, growing in almost all tropi-cal and sub-tropical countries. These plants are in the nature of a woody shrub attaining a height of three or four feet. The leaves are small, oval and of a dark, rich green color.

At intervals along the main stem are recemes, short stalks round which flowers cluster, and on these eventually appear number of small peds containing seeds. While the plant is very hardy and will grow in almost any soil, provided the climate is to its liking, it requires a deep, rich loam which will admit of the pene. tration of the long tap roots, with a loose subsoil through which the moisturn can percolate and reach the roots. The water supply plays an important role in the selection of an indigo plantation, since a great deal of water is employed in the manu-

About the a months after being sown the plant begins to flower, and at this stage the fields are examined daily. When the leaves begin to fade and before the flower bude open the stems are ready for cutting. For this purpose a sharp machete is used, and the blow is dealt about three inches above the ground. Tied in bundles the plants are then carried to the

From the roots of the plants left in the field another eyop will grow, all that is necessary being the usual weeding and a lookout for leaf-cutting ants and other enemies of the young shoots. In from 40 to 70 days it will harvested, a third crop will grow and mature, and sometimes even a fourth crop may be obtained.

The dye is the result of the fermentation of the plants. It is particularly from the leaves that the coloring matter is derived, but in order to avoid the cost of labor, which their separation from the stems would involve. and because in the flower bods and even in the stems there are traces of the dye, the entire plants are treated. The plants are first put in a large vat known as the empapacior) Sum-cient fresh water is admitted to cover the plants, and they are then pressed down by heavily-weighted planks, and left to steep for 12 or 14 hours. The planks are then removed and the mass violently stirred with long poles When the sediment settles at the bottom of the tank, the liquid is run off into a smaller tank, called the batidor. In the batidor the thick and mucilaginous liquid is agitated for two or three hours without occasion. This arrests all further fermentation, which at this stage would spoil the dys.
At the same time this stirring, by continually bringing the liquid into contact with the oxygen of the air, causes certain chemical changes, the result of which is oxide of indigo (in-digotin) which appears in blue particles. These, settling as sediment and eventually solidifying, give that beautiful pigment known as indigo blue. Just before the cessation of the stirring a coagulant of milk of lime is added in order to accelerate the pre-

The water in the second tanks is then drawn off, but not before all the ediment has properly settled. The viscous mass remaining is put into iron pans and boiled over a slow fire. Repeated straining through sacking concludes the process, and when thus rid of all the moisture the thick marine blue paste that results is put into shallow trays and thoroughly dried by means of even and prolonged pressure. The concrete cakes of indigo when emoved from the trays are cut into
