A CROW STORY

People who don't know the crow may find difficulty la believing the following anecdote, though Anglo-

A dog of my acquaintance, a fo terrier of long Kastern experience was one morning sating a chicken bone on the verands, when too crows happened to pass and, observing the dog and his bone wheeled down and lit on the verenda railing, when they set to work crosking to induce him to him to drop his breakfast. Under ordinary circumstances an Knglish dog will fly at a crow the minute he appears; but on this occasion Jack simply looked up, growled, and ountinged grawing. The crows coased croaking and consulted together for a moment, then one of the pair dropped onto the veranda a few yards behind the dog and crocked at him again, once more obtaining no answer but a growl. After strolling casually round the verands for a minute, to let Jack settle down, the bird hopped up silently and swiftly and gave the dog's tail a cruel nip. That was too much With a bowl of pain Jack turned or his tormentor, and crow No. 2, who had been patiently waiting this oppor tunity, swooped down upon the bone and carried it off.

You never saw a dog wear a look such abject humiliation as Jack wore when he recognized how he had been fooled .- Hustrated Christian Weekly.
