THE FOOD OF OVETERS

Professor Himpson, of Edinburgh Uni

Various investigations have shows that about 05 per cent. of the food of the oyster consists of distome and that most of the remainder is composed of other equally minute plants or organisms on the more or less d batable borderland between plants and animal. The oyster obtains these mi eroscopic organisms by drawing feebl currents of water between the open shells, straining them through the exceedingly minute orifices in its gills, and passing the filtrate by ciliary action into its mouth which live up soonced between two pairs of flesh; palps close to the hinge of the valves. Though the currents induced ar feeble they are constant, and during the course of twenty-four bours the water thus minutely strained is many times the volume of the oyster.
