When Old England Started the Day on Beer and Boar's Head. The breakfast appelile of the English-speaking race is not as stout and hearty as it once was. Time was, though of course It was long ago, when the British forbears of a large number of Canadians did not daily with ten and toust, a put of butter, a dash of marmulade and an egg. The English, Corman, Scotch and Irish uncestors of Canadians did not think much of eggs us food, but when they ate them considered them an triffes in the nature of an entree, and would pickled olive or a bit of colery. Hefore tea and coffee entered Europe to modify the breakfast, strong ale or beer was the early morning drink to want the cobwells of sleep from the throat and lighten the lids of the eyes. Men and women took their morning draft of ale or beer. and it was usually a long drink instead of a short one. A quart of ale at breakfast was an ordinary amount. The virtues of a glass of cool water after getting out of ked were not then highly esteemed by so many

If a woman, frail and delicate, hanced to feel that the coplous morning draft of alrong and bitter ale, home brewed, of course, would be a triffe heavy for her on any particular morning, she, her husband, or her serving maid, would prepare for her a most mild and soothing drink, which was a tankard of small heer touched by the flavor of resembry. That was about the limit as a mollycoodle breakfast drink. Then, instead of toust and butter, there might be a boar's head and brawn, a baron or buttock of beef and ventuon pastlen, with large quantities of hotley, and in addition deep potations of wine. vived since the diffeenth century it is clear that 6 o'clock was the breakfast hour in the highest class English

It was during the Elizabethan period that tea and coffee came into fashion in England as the breakfast rivals of strong ale, and a little later chocolate came upon the breakfast table. Eggs began to be understood, and in their natural combination with bacon or broiled ham, began to supplant boar's head, barons of beef and venison pasties.

A Birty-Found Dream.

On Sunday morning before the Derby of 1873 a coster named Timson was awakened by his wife singing out lustily in her sleep. "The boy in valler wins the day" - an old-time popular song. Timson gave Sal a humn and told her to shut up, and, both being now wide awake, asked what all the row meant.

"I dreamt I was on Epsom Downs." she said. "and saw a lockey in valler pass all the others, while the crowd shouted. 'The boy in yaller wins the day.' If there's a jockey in yaller on Derby Day, Ned. I'd put a bit on him Ned again advised her to keep still tongue, but the dream had its
