-Frank It. Walton. "RALEIGH'S NEPHEW"

It is generally agreed that the most distinguishing characteristics of a gentleman is not so much his observance of the rethe higher principles of courtesy. And sometimes while guite unconscious that the occasion is anything critical, young people show to the observant looker on their true status. A young man holding to a strap in a crowded city street car one afternoon was quite unaware that he was the subject of an animated conversation in a rear seat.

"That's Italeigh's nephew," the young man remarked to his companion. not that one. The broad-shouldered fellow in the gray suit."

The girl looked steadily at the unconscious object of her sorutiny. "I think I like his face," she remarked. And then so her companion indulged in an almost imperceptible shrug of the shoulder, she turned toward him, "Why don't you like him ?' she asked point blank.

"I've nothing against him, of cours except-well, in plain English, he seem enything but a gentleman."

"How do you mean ?" "Oh, it isn't easy to explain. there's a comething as far as this follow goes-" Unconsciously his tone had become somewhat contemptuous - "that as a sure and speely way to regale bealth marks him as one who knows little as to-"

The car stopped evidently on the signal combat dyspepale and the many ille that of a woman, evidently a foreigner, who follow in its train, and they are successsat directly back of the young man who ful always. served as a topic of conversation.
