THE OLD FAMILY DOCTOR

HENRY C. BRAINAUD

HE old doctor has broken downfallen with the harness on. I had been an exceedingly severe winter, followed by a late, trying spring. There had been an unusual amount slokness both in the village and in the out lying country. Diphtheria had raged for weeks in Johnny Cake Hollow, and the three miles of awamp road necessary to traverse to reach the Hollow road, as old Norris said, "Bin just perfectly audacious." Like another One, the doctor had spared not himself. Rhaumatism had reached his heart. He had finished biscourse. "Time and toil his iron strength had spent," and he west up to his chamber to dia. The community was startled. shocked. "The doctor sick !" almost inconsistent. Liable never to be out again ? Why, they could not spare kim : he was a fixture in their lives. "This undscorated soldier, of a hard, unequal strife,

Had fought such stubborn lattles with the fors that sought their life : And when many placed to slokasse he stood so strongly by, That half the people felt a notion that the doctor couldn't dia." For weeks the doctor kept what his wif-

The effect of alcohol on efficiency slee to play bile and seek behind the shocks His little grandson said: "Grandpa is would never have been known exactly, of golden grain that stood like silent holding an open clinic; it comes natural But when the new and supposedly infallible o him." But the old doctor smiled and mathods of afficiency at times failed, the cald : "My patients are simply bringing resulting investigation into the cause showback my calla," Many of his visitors did not know each other, would not have spoken to each other on the streets. But the rich and poor, the saint and the sinner, each for reasons of ble own, came, and he knew them all alike To many he gave some little word, or nod, or token which they alone understood, and would be the better for the remembering. All wanted to do something ; some did things the reasons for which only they and the dester understood.

One morning an elaborately contrived and magnificently upholstered invalid chair appeared in his room. An attached pard bore this inscription : "Presented by members of the common council in taken of the years of service given to the public welfare." Late one dangerously stormy evening there appeared at the doctor's kitchen door strange, mysterious character. A silent. noroso, somo said villainous man, who fived alone in a little but behind the awamps, and sustained a precarious existence, estensibly by his dags, like traps and his gun. The next day Elder Eddy came in. The old circuit rider had been through the schools of life. He had studied throbbing hearts. He was well read in living men Heknew something about practical religion He and the doctor had had many a battle in words, but their hands always met in warm grasp. They had "farden" together "Bit down," said the doctor, indicating chair by the bedship; "I wish to talk with you." Then, without a word of soutiment, but straight as an arrow to its mark, the doctor talked.

"Elder, I have only a few days to live. I want you to conduct my funeral services ; I want you to preach to the living and let the deal alone, because, in faint smile shining in his face) I shall not be able to answer back. I do not wish-" The sider broke in-his voice a little husky-"Bee here I you stop! I silmit you have downed me in many an argument, but I know you ; and as the Lord liveth, and as my soul liveth, in this matter I shall not be

The elder knelt by the bodeids. With one hand he grasped the hand of blafriend with the other he seemed to be feeling after God. He found Him. Took hold on Him. Talked with Him as if He knew Him, believed in Him, and trusted Him. And the place was listhel. Toward evening, as the sunset hour coming on, the ductor insisted on being helped into his arm-chair before the oran westward window.

He looked lingeringly over scrott valley. He gazel along the radiant pathway of light through the golden gate of the setting aun. He gased steadfastly as if, like Stephen, he saw heaven opening and the glory of God. His attendant, helping him to lie down, beerved that he leaned heavily. He carefully stretched himself upon ied, deliberately folded his arms, closed blasyes, and said, "Shade the light leave me alone ; I shall sleep now." The old doctor slept, and when the attendant came in later there was upon

A WAR INCIDENT

One of the stories that comes from the seat of war talls of a Scotch sergeant and two or three men who were unable to escape from a certain town when it was taken by the Germana. The little company took refuge in a garret, not more than a a temporary respite. As they sat there, the sergeant proposed that they should have "church purade," for the last time, as they all thought. They sang together very softly the Twenty-third Psalm, the leader read "Thy will be done," his heart ories, "My all stood up reverently to repeat, with bowed besile and closed eyes, the Lord's despens with the despening dawn, the Prayer. As they prayed, steps were heard on the stairs, the garret door opened and the click of a Garman's heels was heard as he came to attention. Not one of the worshippers relead his houl or opened his eyes. In a moment the door again opened quietly and the soldier's footfalls were heard descending the sters. He did not come back. and the Dritishers finally escaped.
