HOW TO KEEP WELL

HY JOHN W. S. MCCULLOUGH, M.D., D.P.H., CHIKE OFFICER OF THE PROVINCIAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

NOSIBLEED.

THE ORDINARY CASE of noneblood the loss of blood will stop spontaneously in a few minutes if the sufferer will remain quiet. . In nome cases the loss of a few teaspoonfuls of blood is helpful rather than barmful, and, therefore, it is just as well to wait a few minutes for spontareous stoppego.

When the time to do nomething arrives it is well to make use of the simplest procedures possible." Grasp the soft part of the nose between the thumb and index finger in such a way as to close both nestrils, and press the wings of the nose against the septum. The septum is the partition which separates the nostrils from each other. The head is then leaned forward without bending the back. After about ten minutes the pressure of the fingers on the nestrile is very alowly and gradually lessened. Five minutes should 36 consumed in turning the ness loose. In the majority of instances the bleeding takes place from a vessel within the territory pressed upon." When such is the case the pressure is reasonably certain to stop the hemorrhage. The method is also efficacious when the bleeding point is higher up. The method of cure in that case is as follows: The nestrin all up with blood. The blood congulates. The clot stops the homorrhage. It is good judgment to leave the clots in the noce for at least an hour after the bleeding has stopped. They can then be cleaned out with a clean handkerchief or by washing in alightly cold water.

If there methods fail the physician must be called upon. He usually examines the membrane for the bleeding point. If he finds it he may touch it with caustic or some milder application. Or, this failing, he will probably pack the nose. There are many causes for neseblood. This explains why some cases are easier remedied than others. Among the causes are the following:-

1. Too much blood. Where nosebleed comes along with a severe congentive headache it gives relief. A certain amount of bleeding helps. 2. Over-exertion. The nosoblood which comes on while children are 3. The onset of infections. Typhoid particularly is liable to start with nosoblood.

5. Injuries; including the scratches made by picking the nose. 6. Chronic diseases and conditions e.g., hemophylla (bleeders). pernicions anemia and leukemia. 7. Vicarious menstruction. 8. High blood pressure. 9. Kidney disease and heart disease. SIX-YEAR MOLARS.

4. Growths in the hose. Nasal polypi are especially to be mentioned.

Notice the mouth of any middle-aged man or woman when he or she laughs or opens the mouth widely in speaking or singing. The chance is that you will notice one tooth gone on each side of both upper and lower jaws. The vacant space is always at the same place-toward the corner of the month. If you ask a dentist which tooth it is that is missing he will tell the the six-year molar.

It is regardeant that the loss of teeth begins with the six-year molar.

The reason is casily understood. The six-year molar comes in at about six years of new 't seems to be the last of the temporary teeth. It is in fact the first of the permanent toeth. Boys and girls do not beath to brush their tooth until they got into personal appearance. The uren to brush the hair, to keep the clothes clean, to wear a tie, and to brush the tooth all ground in the same instinct. In consequence the six-year molars have had neveral years of neglect before the habit of brushing the tooth is cotablished. And then again they are not cleaned as easily as are the front tooth. Presently the molars begin to ache. A dentist is consulted. He finds a large cavity. "The tooth is too far gone. It will be easier and better to pull it," is his verdict. And in consequence the unsightly gap so nearly universal in middle-aged people. The six-year molar is not a deticate tooth. It can be saved To save it a habit must be changed. Instead of beginning the care of the feeth as a part of the preadolescent pex urge, it should be begun in the home in the pre-school years. If children four years old-and even younger were tanget to brush and clean the teeth every day, and if they were sent to the dentist periodically there would be none of these unsightly gaps at the corners of the mouth. By the time the six-year molars are cut the habit of caring for the teeth will have been thoroughly established.
