FAILURE, THROUGH HABIT

The habit of wanting time in largely coponsible for the many failures we see in every department of life. The one with the easy place, who can sit half the hours with idle hands and bruin, finds himself bewildered when he is given a position where constant industry is necessary to his advance ment. It seems impossible to free himrolf from the sluggish habits that hole him down. And he sees another, with perhaps half his talents, leaving him far in the rear because of a capacity for steady work.

Cultivate energy and a habit of rompt decision. Make a practice of having something to fill every minute, whether it is work or pleasure. Time frittered away in idioness means the forming of habits that, in after years, apoll Fatture. .
