THE DOOR OF THE OPEN HEART

In one of the counties of Virginia there is an old and very beautiful little country church. For generations the people round about have listened to nermons preached from the wine-glass pulpit; have been married, and have been buried there. Ivy planted long ago has thrown a shimmering curtain of leav a over the whole church from ground to gable. At one place, where there was a broken window-pane, I has crept into a disused loft above the chancel, and there apread over the floor in a wave of exquisite green Perhaps it has come in from the sun while and bird chatter outdoors to lie perplexing subject or to go roaming a little while in the twilight and peace and to listen for that verse in the

> "O all ye Green Things upon the earth, bless yo the Lord; pruise bim, and magnify him forever." to that as it may, can we not at least see in the try feeling its way all over the church, finding at last that one open pane and creeping through it to fill the loft with its green effulgence, a symbol of God's love, which is always arrounding the hearts of men; always weeking an opening, and always ready, when that opening is found, to pour itself through the heart in living miracie?

There is always this great inexhaust

ble store of love pressing on all hearts: always walting, always ready to enter and give Itself for the refreshment of the world. But it must first find the gateway of the open Heart. Just as the lvy could not get Into the church, although it felt over every inch of the outside wall, until It came upon that one open pane, so this great reservoir of healing love may never pour itself into the world save through those hearts that have opened themselves to it. Just as music must have an instrument of some kind to give it voice, so God's love must have an instrument of some kind to saviours of mankind have been those who, surrendering themselves, have opened their hearts wide to this great inrushing love. The world can never have too much of it. Love, and more love-that has been its need down through all the ages, and will be its need forever.
