-BEING A GOOD LOBER

Part of the education of young people comes through work and part through play, and one of the things your play should teach you is to be good loser. That sloes not mean cultivating indifference us to whother you win or lose. Nothing makes sport more flavoriess than playing with an antagonist who cares nothing about winning. A good loser wants to win, but he does not want it as much us some other things. Bonn young people are so anxious to come out shead in a game that if they are unable to get the victory by fair means, they will resert to cheating. Of course such a sucress is only, a make-believe. The thing they must, care for must be to be thought the cheating is not a victory unined by the only satisfaction they an get be in the thought that they have tracked semeledy into believing what is not

A good loser is in earnest about the games he plays, is destrous of winning and yet would rather be beaten by a worthy opponent, than win front un unworthy one. He accepts defeat without making a fuss, without losing his temper and without accusing his opponent of playing unfairly. When you hear a player expatiating over his opponent's luck or pointing out that the umpire favored the other side, it is plain that he is a poor loser. A college graduate of twenty years standing, came back to his alma mater

one November to see the great football game of the year. The team in which he was interested, played a snappy gume, but was defeated. After the game, he went around for a word with the captain of the losing than who happened' to be the son of an old friend. To his amazement, he found the stalwart six-footer blubbering like baby. Undoubtedly the strain on his perves us well as the disappointment was responsible for his tears, yet something was wrong when a fine, manly young fellow wept like a child over losing a game of football. He knew a great deal about that game and other games, but he had not learn-

The good loser must play to win, but he must not care so much about winning that defeat will spoil his pleasure. He will be ready to admit that he has lost because he was outplayed and will not begin to criticise his opponent's methods or accuse him of unfairness. Of course if his wish to win was sincere, his regret at losing must be real but it will not be carried to unreasonuble lengths. Learn to be a good loser. Learn it in your play time so that if later in life you are called on to undergo loss you will face it cheerily. bravely and with the confidence of better luck next time.
