THE CURIOSITY OF A LITTLE BOY

Little things and little people are often responsible for great results, and maybe you do not know that the discovery of that important instrument, the telescope, may be traced to the curiosity of a little boy. The little boy I am telling you about was the son of an optician who lived in Molland. He and his sisters loved to blay about their father's workbench, and often they amused themselves by looking at the sea through the concave glasses which his father used in his work.

Now, one day It happened that the boy while playing with two of those glasses, changed to hold them before his eyes in such a way that the face of the cathedral clock seemed very This surprised him greatly, for the clock was so far away that he could

For a while he stared at the clock, and then at the glasses, each of which he tried in turn, but the clock was as far rway as ever, and so it remained, turn them as he would, until by chance he turned them both up together, when, lof as if by magic, the church stood "Oh, I know, I know!" he cried aloud "it's the two together." Then in great joy he ran to his father und told him of his great discovery. The father tried the glases in turn and found that the boy had spokon the truth, when he said he could bring the great church clock near. Bo this was the way people learned that putting a concave, and a convex glass together in just the right posttion would make distant objects seem Without this knowledge we should never have had the telescope, and without the telescope we should have known little of the sun, moon or stars. So, if you ever have a chance to look through a telescope, and see the wonders it has to reveal, just remember the little boy who, once lived in
