their usual sleep on a holiday. Because they do not have to go to school or to work the next morning they assure themselves that it is all right to sit up till nearly morning in the pursuit of pleasure. Holiday fare is often upsetting to the digestion. A college student meeting a friend on the street soon after a brief vacation, was questioned by the latter regarding his health, as he looked noticeably pale. "Oh, it's nothing but the after-effect of my vadation feasting," laughed the student. "I'm generally upset for a week or two after get back." And though his manner indicated that this was the customary thing, apparently he had learned no better, from his numerous attacks of indigestion. There is nothing about a holiday to absolve one from regarding the rules of common sense. The fact that you are devoting yourself to having a good time, is no reason why you should disregard the laws of health. The effect of the holiday should be to add zest to work. Monday should not be blue, but rose-colored, and its record for achievement should be the highest for any day in the week, instead of the lowest. If you go to your work after a rest of a few days, feeling reluctant to take hold, it is pertinent to inquire whether the trouble is with your holiday or, with yourself.
