"THE PARTING OF THE WAY" A New Uister Book Appealing in Human Interest

Mrs. Ethel M. Richardson, of Purton House, Wiltshire, England, had already won an enviable reputation as an authoress with her historical works. "The Story of Purton" and "The Idon, and the Rose." Now she adds to her ity and commendation as a new writer in the field of romance. In her new book of the above title Mrs. Richardson has manifestly the happy faculty of ingeniously blending sections of history pertaining to Ulster, with a well-written romance in which the human element is introduced in a skilful and entertaining manner. Characteristics of the family life, thought and aspirations of the better class of folk in the North of Ireland a quarter century ago are vividly portrayed. This is effected in a way which appeals strongly to the people of Ulster and their descendents, and from their standpoint "The Parting of the Ways" is a very homelike, loyal and readible story in which the plot and its principal characters are real flesh and blood Ulster people. The story throughout is well written and the authoress by her innate knowledge of persons. places and everyday life has succeeded in creating and mainting a sustained
