Co-operate for Acton's Future

This paper believes in Acton and Acton's future. It believes that Acton is destined to be a greater town than it is to-day. It believes that the great majority of people living in Acton have an abiding faith in the town's future. It is this faith that has made Acton and it is this same faith that is going to continue to make Acton a better place. No one need talk of "putting Acton on the map." For, all the world knows, Acton is already on the map; it has had a conspicuous place there for many years, and it is going to remain there forever. Acton is already a desirable place in which to live. If one were to look all around the country, none better could be found. When everything is considered, no one honestly can say that any other town is a better place than Acton, for its size. For that reason, if you have money to invest, invest it in Acton. It is safer at home than it is in any place else. Keep out of the clutches of the oily-tongued stock salesman who comes from a distance and wants your money to invest in an enterprise, the merit of which you know nothing save what is told you by the man or men seeking to "separate you from your coin." If you have any money to invest, think it over—and then invest in Acton. Every resident of Acton ought to be loyal for Acton and Acton's enterprises. Owning Acton real estate will go a long way toward making all citizens boosters for the home town. Build or buy a home—and grow with Acton, and enjoy to the full all the benefits of being an Acton home owner.

The Weekly Press

The weekly newspapers of Ontario are finding it a difficult matter to weather the storm of increased costs, decreased rural population and daily newspaper competition, and scarcely a month passes without one or more names, some of them very familiar ones, being added to the list of journalistic casualties. Now it is a long established weekly in Western Ontario which announces suspension, now, another which has for many years recorded the happenings of an eastern community. The struggle has become too acute and publishers, often printers as well as editors, have been unable to overcome the countless difficulties with which they are beset. The more's the pity. The country newspaper is an institution not easily replaced. It mirrors the life of the community, rephrases crudely and frequently inadequately, in a manner which the urban newspaper, in spite of its superior, mechanical advantages and its other pretensions, cannot portray, and it is all the more interesting and all the more valued for its shortcomings. Many weekly newspapers there are, however, which are conducted upon an infinitely higher plane than some of those more influential journals which are fond of heaping ridicule upon them and particularly is this the case with those which maintain strong, well-written editorial columns. If rural newspaper casualties have increased within recent years at an alarming rate one reason is undoubtedly because publishers, unwisely, have permitted the newspaper to assume second place in their activities and have transferred their affections to the job printing office with its hope of greater monetary returns. It is too bad that such should have been the case, for the editorial columns of these newspapers breathed a virility and a public spirit which must have been of great advantage to the communities affected and which made the newspapers themselves welcome visitors to homes far removed from the place of publication. These weekly newspapers are usually the product of a very limited staff and are issued under mechanical and other difficulties of which the man concerned with the publication of an urban newspaper can have scarcely any conception. The reading matter which they contain is generally from the pen of one man and it is possible to measure him by his output. Britton has made the Gananoque Reporter what it is to-day, one of the very finest of the weekly newspapers of Ontario, and without Ross, the Winchester Press, to give another example near home would scarcely occupy the position that it does. The name of Gibbons is inseparably associated with the Cornwall Standard as that of Young is linked with the Cornwall Freeholder, and the same is true of most of the weeklies which have survived the struggles of the last few years. We hope that the day will never come when the last of the Ontario weeklies will have departed. The towns and villages in which they are published should hold similar views and accord to their own home newspapers a liberal support, for without them the main street would not seem quite the same and the community would suffer greatly in prestige. Brockville Recorder and Times.

Those Two Speed Limits

THE FREE PRESS has referred once or twice previously, but will continue to do so until something definite is done, to the anomaly of the two signs at the entrances to town, one, erected by the municipality, proclaiming Acton with a speed limit of fifteen miles; the other, recently erected by the provincial authorities, in connection with the new highway, noting a limit of twenty miles. What opinion of the town and its local government is this sort of thing likely to inspire? As has been said repeatedly in this column, advertising of this kind, that is, when information regarding the municipality is properly presented, is immensely valuable. Many a small industry has been gained when a manufacturer, intending to establish a branch plant, motored through town and saw evidences of business prosperity and municipal progress. The prosperity is evident in Acton all right but little things like those signs evidence anything but the kind of spirit such a business man is looking for.

Better Days for the Housewife

Roger Babson, the eminent United States statistician, believes that soon women in towns and cities, and later women in the country, will not be expected to bake any more than they now expected to weave, as their grandmothers did. Men have joined, he contends, in the civil chorus and have moaned about the disappearance of old-fashioned home cooking, of living out of a tin can, of the decadence of the domestic wife and mother, and "all the rest of the sentimental viciousness which has made women bear extremely unfair burdens." Manufacturers and bakers of food products, he declares, have the best cooks in the world—many of them have laboratory kitchens in their food factories where highly trained expert chefs prepare the most delicious dishes which are cooked scientifically under the most sanitary conditions; bread, breakfast foods, canned goods, and any one of the hundreds of articles now being advertised are better prepared to-day than most housewives could hope for. Labor-saving and electric devices as well, he believes, will come more and more into the homes of the common people, and the drudgery of house work, especially of the kitchen, will be much lessened and women will be freer to deal with the more important work of the home—the intellectual and the spiritual.

Life Insurance

It will be a curious and perhaps an amusing fact to many members of the present generation that Henry Ward Beecher, the great New York preacher, regarded it as his duty to defend the morality of life-insurance. In that day a most respectable portion, indeed, almost a majority, of the public looked upon insurance as a sort of gambling. With a better understanding of the subject, that view has almost disappeared, and what was once regarded as a dubious act has come to be recognized as a personal duty. So rapidly has the business of life insurance grown that the funds of the insurance companies are to-day the greatest aggregations of capital in the world. Billions represent the actual assets of the "old line" life insurance companies, and the insurance in force which they represent is immense. There are millions of policy holders, each insured for an average of a little over two thousand dollars. In addition to this there are millions of working people holding industrial policies. Altogether, more than half of the families on this continent are insured. More and more clearly it has been recognized that insurance is for the man of moderate means a safe and sensible form of saving; and as greater numbers of men of that class have become interested, measures for the better protection of policy-holders have been passed by the legislatures. Companies which were doing an unsafe, although attractive business for a time, have been for the most part eliminated, or turned toward safer channels; and the "mutual" plan has gained favor so rapidly that in theory, at least, there is now no more absolute democracy in the world than a great life insurance company, and insurance, at least of the head of the home, for the protection of the family is now very generally regarded as indispensable.

Independence

Many a young man has declared at the outset of his career, "I shall be dependent on no one, but shall pay as I go and be absolutely free of all obligations." The spirit which prompts such a statement of principle is good. The men who succeed are those with the independent mind. But it is impossible for any one to say that he is under no obligation for the things which he has received and enjoyed. Years after a rebellious youth has told his father that he worked hard at home and earned all that he received, it will dawn on him that no money can pay for a mother's care and a father's interest, and if he have not a wife and child of his own, he will look with envy on these common blessings, not to be bought with money, that even the humblest enjoy. He may think that he is independent as he "pays his way" through college, meeting every bill as it is presented and accepting no favors; but if he looks at the treasurer's report, and analyzes its figures, he will soon discover that he has been the recipient of the bounty of kindly men whom he never knew and who never heard of him—men whose love for their fellows led them to give their money to the college for the benefit of all who might apply. A typical case is that of one of the smaller colleges, which pays twenty-eight thousand dollars a year in salaries alone to the professors, and receives in tuition from the students only twelve thousand dollars. In several of the larger colleges the disparity between the cost of instruction and what is received in tuition is so great that they are seriously considering raising the rate of tuition, so that the annual deficit may not be quite so large. It is not the college student alone who is dependent on the benefactions of others besides his parents. Civilization itself is the product of all the kindly efforts of those who have gone before—efforts made with the more or less conscious purpose of benefiting the children of the future. When the fact of dependence dawns on the mind the sentiment of gratitude is aroused, and finds expression in helpfulness toward others.

What a season this has been for flowers! Not for a long time has the countryside been so covered with dots and blankets of blossoms. And not for a long time, as well, have the annuals of the good housewife and of the garden plot yielded so generously. It appears probable, also, that the fall varieties will be present in the same profusion. Another form of a good harvest.

EVADING THE LAW
The London Telegraph tells a story of a collier who amused himself with flying pigeons. He had occasion to go to town recently and took with him a bird in a bag. He was about to toss up the pigeon in the townhall square when a policeman came up and told him that the bird must not fly the bird there.
"Why not?" asked the collier.
"Because it is forbidden, and I shall have to lock you up if you do."
The collier, with the usual sharpness of his kind, thereupon took the pigeon out of the bag, set it on the ground, stroked its wings and said to him: "You can't lock me up here, no you must walk whom; dost thou hear? thou man walk whom."
The bird, of course, rose in the air, leaving the policeman petrified with astonishment.

AN ACROSTIC
Can you discover this Italian city?
The first is in night, but not in day;
The second is in cat, and also in nest;
The third is in people, but not in dark;
The fourth is in light, but not in palm;
The fifth is in finger, but not in palm;
The sixth is in sing, and also in song;
A name of a city in Italy.
