"INDIAN SUMMER"

Summer is gone, and Winter is nigh The time has come for the year to die; A sleeping haze between earth and sky, While soft winds croon.

Indian Sammer's Illusory spell Has hung its enchantment on hill an Autumn's lingering, last farewell-Before the snow. Mist, grey dawn, and shimmering

A golden day that must fade too soon Crescent-thin hangs the twilight moon On sunset's rim. Feathery branch of birch and pine,

The upward slopes of the hills outline: bird's voice claiming, "The world And all is still. A throbbing silence, that faint recalls Muted music! Its joy entralis! . Peace on the waiting spirit falls-While white stars shine.

THE DAYS OF YORE

To the Editor of the Free Press, Dear Sir: There have been several matters to the front in the FREE PRESS in recent issues that have interested me much, and I have thought you might allow me to indulge in filling a little space

One of them has to do with the past -the now long-distant past. The refcrence to matters connected with Rev. Zenas Adams and his burial place have interested me. I have sometimes, years ago, strayed into the Old Churchyard, and remember the shaft placed, not far from Crewson Mc-Laughlin's house, with "Rev. Zenas Adams" name thereon. But in all the references of late there has been nothing said about what may be considered a chief item re this good man. Don't ye sorter see their faces. minisces were up, that the first sermon in the community was preached by Zenas Adams in a little log school opposite the present Brick Church at the Erin townline, but in Esquesing The text was one which I think I have And she smiled there in the doorway never heard preached from in a fairly long life of almost continuous church attendance: "Oh, wretched man that am, who shall deliver me from the As we did in sweet back yonder, body of this death." There is indeed an apparent effort in these progressive days to detail human goodness so much that there is not much "wretchedness" felt, But the other matter has to do with Acton's future and far-distant future. That is, the acquiring by the corporation for school purposes of the Sidney Smith property as advocated. This seems to particularly interest me from special acquaintance with the place: Not only did my three children, now widely separated in Alberta, Wisconain and Montreal, receive their education at the present school premises, but I was a member of the School Board for five years, followed by nine years as caretaker. While in some respects the present, property is ideal in its quiet retirement, it has been difficult of access, and the proposed purchase would shorten the walk, especfally desirable in north-west winds, and still there would be the retirement retained. It seems to me to be a peculiarly pshyocological moment in
