A Faithful Life.-It was the custom Molal, at the close of his term of office, must stand trial by his fellow citizens. Everyone who had any charge or complaint to make brought his accusation against the retiring omelal who was in turn expected to defend himself and his administration. was a day of rockoning indeed for any official whose record was not clear but it was the highest honor to have passed this test unscathed. In this lesson, Hamuel closes his long career of usefulness as Judge of Israel with such a test solf-imposed. Feurlessly be challenged all men to bring their charges against him; and he was arbwarded with unanimous vindication who feel sutlaffed with themselves besause their record Is a fair average, who are well content because the black marks on their record are balanced by the record of good deeds. A far nobler ideal, however, is represented by this man who aspired to absolute spotlessness, whose dream was not of passable

Like All the Nations.-The error of the people, as Samuel saw it, lay not as if just that fact of liavin' differentthe people, as bainder a strong colored papers round their bundles and well-ordered government, as in the would have been 'nough to let 'em fact that they ignored the moral and know which was which, but'it wa'n't. did not specify that the desired king bad been over to Sennitt's store and should be either good or God-fearing, got two pounds of wieigk, and on his tions."
