TO EACH HIS OWN

You roll along in your limousine, I suffer the dust you fling. As over the footpath I blithely fare, where the glad-heart vespers ring; Riding is good, and I like not dust, this I tell you true: For all your cushloned and careless care, I would not change with you!

You glance through a window casually, and note that the trees are green; Questing, I joy in the wee nest hid midst the hedgerow's sheltering screen; An instant you see the squirrel's polse, on the trunk of a grand old tree; I stop for a friendly argument, and he Isaac, and Bob would be lost without

You fret at the tricksy, sun-shot shower that dims your crystal pane; I stand bliss-bound in the irregrance loosed by the fingers of the rain! You catch a glimpse, as you whirl along, of the wide sky's blue and white;

I thrill to the sweep of its loveliners, its marvellous breadth and height! To some engagement you hurry past I lotter on, from friend to friend, at the close of a toll-filled day; You ride, over rather a boresome swiftly as my be: I walk, in a wonder-world-and yet, yo would not change with met Minnie Leona Unton
