THE COST OF WHAT WE DO NOT KNOW

A business man recently made the remark: "What we don't know costs a lot." That bears thinking about. Considerable is said about the cost of education, and it is true that this is expensive, but something far more costly is ignorance. What we pay for that, which we know is a trifle compared with what we pay for the things we do not know.

THE EARLY HABITS

We are often astonished when people we have always thought of as well-mannered, are suddenly guilty of some act so uncouth and ill-bred that we can hardly believe our eyes. In other cases well-educated people in moments of excitement may use ungrammatical English. The explanation is that the correct manners in the first instance, and the correct speech in the second are recent acquisitions. In moments of inattention the old habits take control.

MAKING MINUTES PAY

A little story told of Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, suggests one of the differences between successful people and those who never get anywhere. One of his managers tells of an occasion when Mr. Kreisler, having given a concert in a Michigan town, was driving across country to another large town about sixty miles away. The violinist and his accompanist occupied the back seat of the car, with a piece of sheet music open before them, and although they occasionally looked up to make some comment on the scenery, the music absorbed most of their attention. As they neared their destination, Mr. Kreisler said to his accompanist, "Well, Carl, we can do that now." In the two hours they had committed to memory practically sixty pages of music.

LAGGING VETERAN

"It is very hard to drive a bargain," said the fellow who had bought an old flivver for $10.

WHERE PROVIDENCE TAKES A BACK SEAT

Joan, five, out to sea, was puzzled when she saw the family bow their heads for grace. "What are you doing?" she asked. "Giving thanks for our daily bread," she was told. "Don't you give thanks at home, Joan?" "No," said Joan, "we pay for our bread."

A RACE OF TENORS

Generally speaking, tenors living at high altitudes, have weaker and more highly-pitched voices than those living in regions where the supply of oxygen is greater. This is in North America, among the Indian living on the plateau the men have voices like women, and the women like children.

GIRL GUIDE NEWS with image of a girl in a hat

The Chaffinches have been waiting and waiting to tell you just what they thought of camp. Having had to wait so long, the poor birds have decided that you must have concluded they were eaten by mosquitoes. Nunnal (as they say in the comic cuts) that was not it. In the first place, whatever mosquitoes there were evidently died panic-stricken into the lake. As the lake was very deep, that was probably the end of those mosquitoes. We will say so, at any rate. Also, it was quite impossible for mosquitoes even to meditate on eating any of the Guides, especially the Chaffinches. Even the worthy old cow, who whistled around our bunkhouse at night, could not have accomplished that feat. (Dot Babcock was sure she would begin on her). Why? Nothing at all. We ate everything!

In the morning when we had to arise fifteen minutes earlier for Cook's Patrol, the first thought was breakfast. As soon as we came down from swimming, our first thought was dinner. Likewise, did we think of supper. Now, oh citizens of Acton, listen to these words of wisdom. If you wish a good cook for camp, take Miss Wales, our Quartermaster and Cook. Despite the fact that she splits water on the stove, peeled potatoes (when she wasn't looking) with luscious several feet thick, despite the fact that Miss Wales told me, in despair, that if she were my husband, she would leave home; despite all our mistakes—every meal was good, and the greatness of the goodness was exceeding great. In other words, everything was good, and there was plenty of it. (Now you will have concluded that all we Guides are epileptics.) You know the moon had a great time watching us. It always seemed to hover over the tip of a pine, close to the Chaffinches' bunkhouse. Sometimes it was a trail wisp of gold; sometimes "a ghastly galloway tossed on cloudy seas;" sometimes a rept maiden, rising to the blueness of the night through a gentle rain of silver. One night it was not there at all. Dear lovely, changeable moon! What does it could tell! How it must have smiled at the melodical which floated on the air each night—everything from "When the Moon Comes Over the Mountain," to "Oh Where, Tell Me Where." You really ought to hear the Orchids sing the latter selection. (That isn't gentle sarcasm either.) The nights were the times of everything beginning with "a," except "sleep" and "shelter." Oh, Esther, there's a moth—look! In a rapturous shriek concludes the rest. (That is Edna Hinton.) A little later comes the plaintive voice of Dot Babcock. "Won't someone please close the flap of the canvas. That old cow is sure to lick my nose." Esther Woods begs, loudly, "Let's count sheep. One—two." Dot MacArthur, commands, drowsily, "Not sheep. Let's go to sleep!" "Aye!" echoes Esther. "Aye, aye!" says Hensie. (When Edie was in our bunkhouse her sole answer was a melodious sniff.) Both she and Hensie came up for the week-end and fed us on tea waters.

TWO KINDS OF SYMPATHY

A blind man who has made an outstanding success of his life, tells how in his boyhood, he learned to distinguish between the two kinds of sympathy. Some neighbors, calling at the house one day, agreed that a boy blinded as he had been, should never be obliged to do a stroke of work; that the world owed him a living. After they had left, the family doctor had his say. With his hand on the boy's shoulder he declared, "There are things far sorer than being blind. One of them is being good-for-nothing." Now these people who thought it was a shame for a blind boy to work, meant well. They gave sympathy but it was of a sort to let him down. If he had listened to them, he would have become a helpless, useless, unhappy man; but he had another friend who showed sympathy by prodding him, by making him feel that as bad as his blindness was, something worse was in store for him if he were not careful. As you go through life you will be the recipients of both sort of sympathy. One sort will be as relaxing as a hot bath. It will make you feel like weeping over your hard luck. The other sort will be more like a peck of a pin. It will stir you up to escape worse results than those already experienced. When you meet these two kinds of sympathy, turn away from that which makes you sorry for yourself, and listen to the sort that is like a battle cry.
