The lead in "lead pencils" is not lead. but graphite. When this mineral was discovered it was named "plumbago." uses for writing purposes were perceived, the articles made were called pencils. When first made, the graphite was cut into thin sheets and then into strips for encasing in wood. The pencils made by for more than half the material was wasted in the process. Consequently very few people could afford to use them.

Confe, a Frenchman, discovered, during the last century, how to pulverise graphite and mix it with fine clay in from the Guelph General Hospital on varying proportions so as to produce pencils of different hardness with uniform quality throughout, and without wastage of material. This marked the arrival of the modern pencil, and factories soon sprang up and the cost of production was brought down so low as to bring these articles within the reach of

Only one kind of wood, that of the pencil cedar tree is really suitable for encasing the leads. This tree was in danger of extinction some twenty years ago, owing to the enormous demand for pencils. As a precaution, metal and paper covered pencils came into use.

The degrees of hardness in pencils are indicated by leitering. Thus, H means moderately hard, HH is harder, and so on. The hardest pencils, 6H, are used for technical drawings.

A moderately soft pencil is B, and very handy for writing on soft or thin paper. BB up to BBBB are the soft and very black pencils used by artists for sketching and landscape work. are known as drafting pencils.
