THE WEEKLIES

Just as politicians seek the support of small-town and rural sentiment, it is suggested that business, particularly Big Business so-called, should endeavor to win the understanding of the people who live outside the large cities. Business largely has neglected an influential portion of the population where the politicians, including the demagogues, have been busy for generations.

If we were to inquire as to how best to reach the rural people with the messages of explanation which are the prelude to understanding, the answer must be that the country weekly papers are publications which are closely read by their subscribers, their subscribers' families and their subscribers' neighbors. One would not suggest that metropolitan opinion be neglected by omitting the messages from the daily papers. But it is believed that the work is not being eyed half done if only the metropolitan papers are used.

Economic and other conditions which have led to the demise of the party organ and the reduction in the number of daily papers, likewise have brought about the death of a hundred or two of the rural weeklies of a generation ago. But the 700-odd weeklies which are left have survived because there is room for them, and two or three hundred of these publications are serving their communities superlatively well. An institutional advertising campaign which overlooks these papers is a campaign which is incomplete. Therefore it is likely to be ineffective in part.—The Printed Word.
