Hopes for an early start on Oakville's long-deferred Post Office building were revived early this week, when citizens observed men surveying the lot east of the Red Indian service station, on the south-east corner of Colborne and George ed site was made by J. BRINGS GOOD RESULTS

Grazing by live stock and burning probably create more damage to the farm woodlot than any other agencies, and therefore, foresters recommend fencing the woodlot from cattle and taking particular care to see that fire does not burn over the woods. By following certain simple rules farmers can get good results out of the care of the woodlot. These rules are: 1. Keep the live stock out of the woods. 2. Confine annual cutting to a definite area of the lot. 3. Make no large openings in the woods.

4. Favor the thriftlest best-formed crop trees. 5. Remove some of the larger crop trees where crowding exists. 6. Cut inferior trees for wood. 7. Protect the woods against fire. The reason why live stock should be kept out of the woodlot is that their presence tends to have the litter trampled under the trees and packs the soil so that the water run-off and consequent erosion of soil are encouraged. Further the admission of live stock to the woodlot prevents the proper growth of the new crop of trees which comes up under normal conditions to replace the trees that are harvested. The actual growth of the standing trees also is reduced through the abnormal conditions thus set up By keeping live stock out of the woodlot, normal conditions prevail and with proper thinning of the stand by cuiling the inferior trees, the timber crop will be improved. It is estimated that farm woodlots, espectally hardwoods, will produce at least 50 per cent, more lumber if the lots are protected from fire and heavy pasturing avoided, the increase in production being realized by the greater number of standing trees and by the less defect in the lumber that is grown. 'Another essential in the production of full lumber crops is the employment of methods of cutting trees which favor continuous growth. Although farm woodlets do not require the same attention as orchards, at the same sime, to obtain profitable returns, some attention must be given to the conditions of growth.

Pollowing good woodlot practices of cutting will not result in a change overnight; but the property can be expected to develop gradually to the point of yielding highest returns. One advantage lumber has over some other farm crops is that it does not have to be sold immediately in order to keep it from smallto grow and increase in value.

The Well-Planned Will

Whether their Estates are large or small, all men and women should have their Wills properly planned and drawn and should appoint a competent Executor to carry out their wishes, so that in the administration of their estates, difficulty and loss will be avoided to those who are to benefit.

The Guelph Trust Company acts as Executor and Trustco and while big enough and equipped to handle estates of any size, is not too big to give the necessary personal attention to the smallest details of administration.

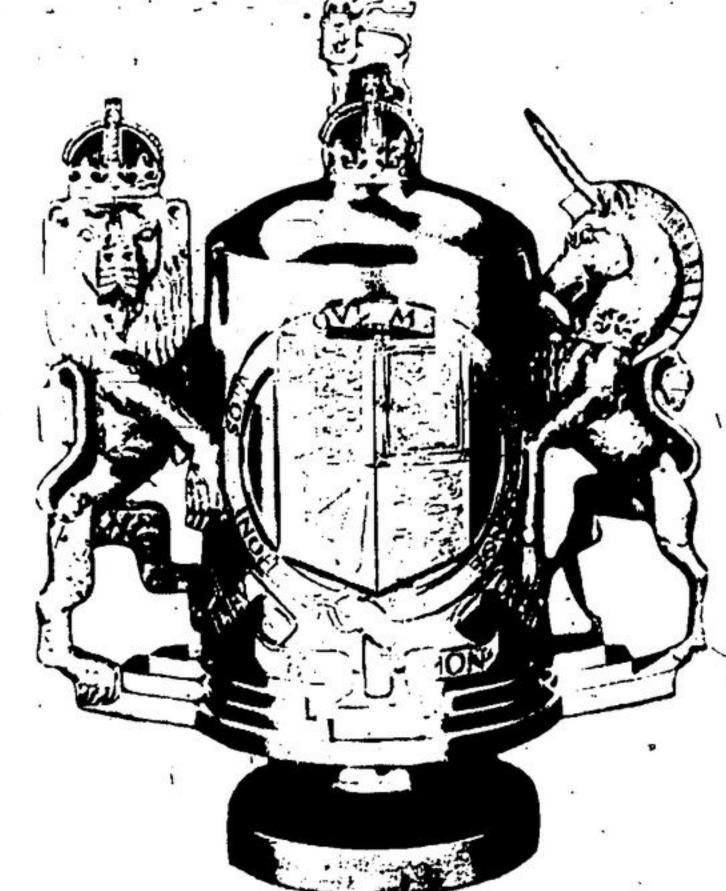

We would be glad to discuss Estate Planning with you, All enquiries are treated with strict confidence.
