Boulder Nearly Wrecked the Burlington Bridge

An attempt to wreck the Canadian National Railway swing bridge over Burlington Canal by placing a huge stone in the gears was averted by the quick action of bridge operator Percy Roworth. Royal Canadian Mounted Police have been called in to investigate.

Roworth was closing the 180 foot span for an approaching freight when he sensed something amiss and immediately threw out the control switches.

The bridge came to a grinding stop and investigation revealed a large boulder, partially crushed, jammed in the driving gears at the center of the span.

Calling on Lighthouse Keeper Alfred Cripps, Roworth rammed the obstruction and resumed operation of the structure. The gears affected controlled the raising and lowering of the rails, rails which carry all C.N.R. fast freight and special trains across the Burlington Beach sand-strip, between Freeman and Stony Creek.

Damage estimated at $1,000 was done, but it is believed that had Roworth not stopped the bridge when he did, the resulting damage would have tied up the bridge for several weeks before repairs could have been effected.
