ESSENTIALS FOR GETTING ALONG WITH YOURSELF AND WITH OTHERS

To be able to face the daily requirements of life with equanimity and a confidence that one is equal to the challenge of the day, or at least capable of accepting defeat philosophically.

To be able to face realities, not run away from them through subtleties.

To be able to take one's place in everyday life without more than occasional friction in relationships with other persons.

To be able to look with reasonable tolerance upon the annoyances which are inevitable in living.

To want to win, but to be able to lose gracefully.

To cherish no grudges.

To seek advancement, but without feverish grasping for more wealth, power, fame or success than one has capacity to win or to use.

To be able to laugh at oneself, perhaps the greatest evidence of a well controlled mind.

To accord to others a right to their own viewpoints and ideas.

When the mop became a bird hotel, Mrs. Hitchens bought another one, and found herself amply repaid for it, in watching the antics of the feathered "squatters."
