This morning, June 11th, a plane, stamped with the letters C.F.-B.Q.J., and carrying two passengers, one the pilot and an instructor, who en route from London to Malton air port, lost their way and decided to land and find out where they were. This happened to be a large field of spring grain owned by Mr. Wm. Early, two miles north of Campbellville. They tried to communicate with both points, but as telegrams were out of order, caused by the storm of the night before, they were unsuccessful. They decided to continue on, but here again there was trouble, because of the rain on the fresh worked land. After several attempts, the pilot decided to abandon his passenger, to see if the difference in weight would help. He skirted away with the first attempt, making a goodbye motion with his palm, and left his passenger to hitch-hike to Malton. As the mist and rain continued through the day, we wonder if he arrived safely.
