Just Fishing

master of the craft carrying the Mason-Harrison combine. The boat bobbed about and boy, how that wind swept across the lake. It looked like a cold party for late June. Off-Windy Point the boat came down with those bumps that settled you well in your seat. Before we went across from Bell Isle, an open sweep of water, we had to change positions to keep the front end of the craft out of the water and help keep the water from coming over the sides too liberally.

Before we reached the fishing grounds the sun had peeked through a wee patch of blue sky. The low clouds scurried along and patches of blue sky became larger but the wind kept up. The boat swung about pretty well as we worked that 150 to 200 feet of trolling line with the short motions that the instruction on a Williams Wobbler but tell you are so important. By two o'clock we decided to have dinner on the shore. A summary of the catch revealed that both boats were doing fine and we could have fish on the menu for a shore dinner.

The spot chosen was a rocky knoll, equipped with a heap of stones to make a place for the fire and a grate. The menu, beans, bacon, fish that had been kicking around in the lake an hour or so before, bread and butter, preserved blueberries and cake. Eggs were also in the grub box but everyone preferred more fish. Joe Fuller and Bill Clayton proved just as efficient cooks as they were guides. minus the furniture, both fish-never-put-up-better grub. We nearly forgot we had tea, too, made over the open fire in a tin pail.

That meal was so satisfying and the sun was so hot on Friday noon that shortly after the meal, and Hitler and Mussolini had been accused of half being the despicable things they are a silence fell on the group as one after the other fell asleep and the stillness of that great north was broken only by the deep breathing of the 'oie' who laid on his back.

Fishing again at four o'clock and arrival back at camp about eight in the evening. Had fifteen fish ready for the young men at the fishery to clean, examine, measure and weigh—not a bad day's catch. We had fish again for supper.

Perhaps we should just mention that evenings might be dull if a group could not arrange a game of euchre. Modesty forbids us to divulge what pair was the most successful at the pastime.

Saturday the lake was as calm as a lily pond. The sun was hot. By noon winter clothing was shed and we flared in our shirt sleeves. That day's catch was up to the limit of five aple and the fishing was over before 4.30.

We don't expect anyone to believe this because we never believed any other fisherman who told a similar story. Amos Mason, Bill Clayton and the editor still stick to the story and they are the only group who will ever credit the yarn. It's the story of the big fish that got away.

We needed just one fish to make our count and we wanted a big one just for exhibition purposes. It looked as if we had the answer to our quest when the end of that trolling pole hit us a terrific punch in the stomach and the tug on the line felt like a tow line on a car stuck in a snowdrift.

There was all the evidence of a big one. Unlike the smaller ones, he tried to keep to the bottom. The line was right beside the boat and that fish was still keeping under water. With a final wind of the reel he came beside the boat—seven or eight pounds of kicking trout! Bill Clayton took a look at him and said, "You sure got that one boy, and can't get away." He reached over to pull him into the boat. The line slackened and he got all that fish went back into the lake!

An unravelling line tangle it was found he was wound up in the other line from the boat. An examination of the bait showed one of the hooks broken off. We proved one point only, that no fish is ever hog-tied in a line and hook so that he hasn't a chance of getting away.

Sure, we were disappointed, but no more than Bill Clayton. He assumed all blame on himself because he had neglected to use the gaff hook that was in the boat. He requested that he be administered a chastisement. But a boat is no place for giving a kick on a spot that is face down on a boat seat. And the loss of a big fish is no excuse for the severing of a companionship that had shown such a wealth of splendid qualities in other ways.

We got co-operation out of the difficulty by Amos Mason catching another fish of very moderate size to make up the count. That's our story, believe it or not.

Both boats scoured their full count of fish. In fact, we have never visited Opeongo Lake yet without getting a full catch. Those twenty fish made a real picture when laid out on a canoe bottom. Mr. Harrison's movie camera clicked off a picture of the catch, with the fishermen arguing as to size. Those pictures of moose, deer and the group at shore dinner will be a film we will be very anxious to see, since it is our first appearance in the movies.

That night a whippoorwill perched on the hill back of the cabin. In the silence of the night he was a real soloist. It was not necessary to be lulled to sleep. In the morning five deer grazed on the hill overlooking the cabins.

Perhaps we should tell you about the genial host, Joe Avery, and the farming and building progress being made. The cabin, started last year when we were there, is now ready for occupancy. It is a nice three-room log building, commanding a splendid view.

Perhaps numbers of our readers have had apple trees that only bear every other year. Well, it's just the same with the bottomless pumpkin crop. They are a rotating or alternating crop. This year a pig sty, with six little pigs, for which Joe Avery told us he paid "46 a pair," was on the garden plot. They were a contented lot, just eating and sleeping and growing into pork. Next year we suppose this site will be the one chosen for planting pumpkins on that grow so fast they will have the bottoms worn off them keeping up with the vines. That's another story you don't need to believe.

The net and dunnage loaded in the big motor boat, we made away from the port. A short distance down the road a furious horn blowing had every symptom of a wedding party. It wasn't, but it was Joe and Bill coming after us with a fishing pole that had been left behind at the wharf.

The trip up was just a little over two hundred miles. Back by way of Huronville and No. 11 Highway the speedometer on Mr. Mason's car was about ten miles further. The day's catch, which it was permissible to bring home, wasn't nearly as many as we would have liked for distribution. The sunburn and black fly bites we also gathered we would not wish on anybody.

This has been our third trip to Opeongo Lake. Never once has the catch been disappointing, the most genial, the food good, and the company excellent and after all these are the requisites of any successful fishing party. It has been said by others that the bait was paramount, but we prefer to put the emphasis as named above.
