World's First Toothbrush

Britain, where the world's first toothbrush was made in 1870, is supplying overseas countries with more brushes than ever before. Last year she exported from 25 to 30 per cent. more brushes than in previous years, when sales totalled 1,000,000 to 1,200,000 annually. In spite of the loss of European markets, which British brushes have a high reputation. Among the markets where progress has been made, largely at the expense of Germany, are South Africa, India, and other Empire countries. More sales are also expected from Canada, Australia and South America. At least one of Britain's brush-making firms have been established for over one hundred and fifty years, and no fewer than twenty-seven are between 100 and 250. One of them made the first toothbrush by inserting hairs from a cow hide through a few holes in a piece of carved bone, and to-day they are developing the use of nylon, a synthetic substitute for bristles, as a material for various kinds of toilet brushes. It has been found to have several advantages over natural bristle.
