Chronicles of... Ginger Farm

Written Specially for The Acton Free Press by GWENDOLINE P. CLARKE

Hot weather, and then cold, was too much for my chickens. They developed coccidiosis. I spelled that last word without looking it up—wasn't that wonderful? But maybe it isn't spelled right—that's another thought! Anyway my chickens took the disease that would knock anyone out of a spelling match—and it knocked them out too, even though they didn't have to spell it. One day I lost four little chicks, and then two and then one for several successive mornings before I realized what was ailing them as I have never had trouble like that with my chickens before. However, after taking the advice of a poultryman to feed dry buttermilk the chickens soon began to show signs of improvement. Now they are just back to normal. Coccidiosis is a terrible disease—hard to spell, difficult to pronounce, and fatal to chicks. It is pronounced in about as many different ways as "tomato"—and that's saying something. The poultryman who advised me is a college graduate and I noticed that he pronounced it "cock-sid-oh-sis." Now you try and say it!

Just a little while ago I indulged in as pretty and fascinating a piece of nature study as anyone could want. Along our clothesline were six little barn swallows. I thought at first they were full grown birds but suddenly another seven flew over with a succulent morsel of food for what I now knew were her fledglings. Back and forth went the mother bird and I always knew, when she was returning before I even saw her as the first three of the little birds would start fluttering their wings and opening their beaks. Each little swallow was fed in turn—you could almost imagine the mother bird saying—"Now you be good little birds and I will bring each one of you a nice juicy worm." What I couldn't understand was why the next three birds didn't flutter their wings and show excitement like the others when the mother bird was approaching, and why they were not fed like the rest. Presently the mystery was solved. The second three birds belonged to a different family. When their mother appeared they too showed signs of expectation with wings and beaks. What I noticed? By what means do these wee feathered minis recognize their own kith and kin?

One time the parent birds were gone longer than usual. Two of the fledglings apparently got tired of waiting and flew down to the potato patch. Like a flash the parent birds appeared as if by magic and chased their too adventurous offspring back to the safety of the clothesline. I am quite sure the mother swallows were saying quite forcibly—"You stupid, naughty children, don't you know that a fly, crouching at lives in that big house ready to spring on you if he once gets the chance? Don't you know that until your wings are strong enough for swifter flight you must never, never take such a chance again?"

And speaking of children—we had a surprise telephone call from Daughter this afternoon. It is nice to have one of our "bigson pals" within calling distance. It gives one a sort of warm, comfortable feeling. Isn't it wonderful when any member of your family is away to sometimes pick up the telephone receiver and hear his or her voice over the wire? You may actually be miles apart—and then distance shrinks to a mere nothing.

On the telephone, for the space of a few minutes you are close—as close to each other as if you were in the same room. It is a good thing the government has asked us to go easy on long distance calls, and that such calls cost more than a postage stamp, or I might be tempted to do more telephoning than writing. Letter-writing has been my bug-bear for some time. I seem to have hardly any time for it at all—or I am too tired when I have the time. This I regret for no one likes receiving letters better than I do. But I don't look for many these days, for who wants to keep up a one-way correspondence. Of course I don't neglect our soldier son. He is still on Vancouver Island. Not much chance of a telephone call from him—more likely a wire to tell us... what? Isn't that what every mother wonders who has a son away from home? Sometime we know that that wire, telephone call or letter will come. We can't stop it—we can only prepare ourselves to meet it. Personally I don't think we should shy away from the thought. Rather should we accustom ourselves to the idea, remembering the many homes to which that final message has already come and ask ourselves why we should expect the fortunes of war to favor us any more than the thousands of other mothers of boys in the service.
