London Fireman Now Makes Arms

LONDON, (CP)-The answer to that question "What became of the London fireman, the hero of the blitz?" is out. He is a munitions worker.

Not in an out-and-out factory but in any one of between 250 and 300 stations throughout London. The firemen and firewomen, confronted with a lull in German air attacks. pitched into the munitions game and are now working 100,000 man hours a month on war production. Without direct payment, they are continually expanding an output which includes parts for fighter and bombers, submarines, corvettes, tank landing craft, tanks, several types of gun, bullets, shells, and mines, equipment for paratroops and commandos, and signal apparatus. "The work," said an official, "In having a tremendous effect on morale. They feel they are contributing something useful, to the war effort while standing by in readiness to fight fires."

Dear Sir:

It is some time since I have dropped you a line, but really I have had nothing interesting to write about been running to the same two ports all summer, and that is only three trips, but now we shall be moving to, shall I say. "Greener Pastures"? And may later on be able to have a little more interesting news for you. Our trips this summer have been uneventful, at least as far as enemy craft went, foggy weather, cold, warm, rain and sunshine, and of course, we got caught in one bad storm, with no cargo and had a very close call, but my old luck stuck right with me, and
