Ploughing under green sweet clover crops for a period of years at Brandon Experimental Farm, Manitoba, has not resulted in any worthwhile increase in the yields of wheat. However, it has been definitely established that higher yields of wheat can be obtained when sweet clover sod is ploughed immediately after the removal of the 1st hay crop than when bromo or western rye grass sod is ploughed. The difference in the yield may be the result of the clover adding nitrogen to the soil.
