COMMUNIST SCAPEGOAT

Communists seem to have little sense of humour, but they have great agility as mental and moral contortionists and conjurers. The statement issued by the Communist Labor Progressive Party referring to the arrest of Sam Carr, the fugitive national organizer of that party, was a good example of mental and moral contortion and slight-of-hand. It begins by charging that the arrest "pre-fabricated" "baloney" and that the charges of espionage against Carr were a "frame-up" and false, and yet it declares that he had been "excluded from all office in our party" when he fled the country.

If the party really believed that the charges against its chief organizer were false and the espionage investigation was a frame-up, why should it excommunicate a man whom it regarded as innocent? The statement says: "We condemn the use of espionage and disassociate ourselves unreservedly from any who engage therein." The very fact that they dismissed Carr is evidence of their belief at the time that he was guilty of the espionage from which they wished to "disassociate themselves."

The other leaders of the party could hardly be associated so long and intimately with Carr without knowing something of his extra-party activities, and they must know that he had a good reason to flee the country. It is quite obvious that they used him for a scapegoat. Whether Carr is guilty of the charges laid against him is a matter for the courts, but his party has already passed judgment on him by peremptorily dismissing him from office and membership.

single, Kentner's goal was the prettiest of the night—scored when he cake-walked in solo fashion.

With only a few seconds left, Kentner and Martin paired off in a bout but officials Olinski, a cop incidentally, and Lacombe brought it to an abrupt halt by running quick interference. Two of the six penalties imposed were incurred this way.

Several bruising checks and high sticks inflicted minor wounds on players in a la-de-da second period wound on his nose. Nick Ferri was dealt a particularly heavy body check and had to leave the game after a brilliant display of puck sagging while Haiders were short. J. Beaumont and Patterson also were victims of high sticks.

Best-Seller

By Joseph Lister Rutledge

There is one small encouraging fact among all the disturbing thoughts that crowd about us. It is that a vast army of people must be thinking more generously and earnestly and must be keying their thoughts higher than we have permitted ourselves to believe.

The year just past has not been a good year in the publishing business. With a few outstanding exceptions, book sales have been more limited. It has been more difficult than usual to decide what will catch the public fancy. Only one item has gained ground in the year 1948, on this continent alone. The Bible has represented a sale running into the tens of millions.

No one knows just how many millions but the American Bible Society alone accounts for just short of ten and it is only one of many such agencies.

But quite apart from these, the publishing business itself from a soundly business standpoint has been a steady producer. Scores of new editions came from the press, ranging from Bibles to sell at a dollar or less to a handsomely designed edition that will sell for $150. All the best sellers lumped together don't approach the record sales of the Bible. And the strange thing is that this is not notable because more Bibles were sold in 1948 than in former years but that the Bible maintained its steady pace year after year in its millions and never a surfeit.

There must be then, more of a bulwark against the evil creed of communism than we sometimes believe. For even those who believe that Christianity can exist side by side with an idealized communism agree that Christianity can make no terms with Marxist communism. Whatever its political and economic theories, the Communist Manifesto cannot live in peace with the Bible, nor the out-and-out communist with the followers of Christ. It is heartbreaking then to know that the book of books still holds its commanding and unassailable position in the face of every challenge. The world's best seller, the world's best hope.
