Chronicles of Ginger Farm

Written Specially for The Acton Free Press
OWEN DOLINE P. CLARKE

By this time everyone knows what caused the dim-out on the last Sunday and Monday in September but when I started out to visit a friend yesterday afternoon I had no idea what was happening. Driving along the road was the most weird experience I ever knew. Down this way there was no fog so that the mountain stood out in sharp outline against dark rolling clouds into sudden shades of blue purple and reddish-yellow. To the south the sky was fairly light yet the road before me was dark and forbidding. It was really spooky and like everyone else, I was driving with lights on. Another queer thing I noticed was that instead of glass windows all the houses seemed to have windows of glittering tinfoil. The whole set-up had the appearance of the supernatural and the thought came to me that it must be a New Year McCallum for keeping us on Daylight Saving Time! Certainly there would be no power saved yesterday as it was impossible to do anything in the house without lights on.

COSTLY AND CRUEL

Compulsory retirement of all people at a certain age would be costly and cruel argues the Financial Post.

A little rose-covered cottage in the country is a fine thing for a man who likes it. But there are a great many people who don't. They would much rather go on working, perhaps not full time, but at least for some part of the day. And they will be healthier and happier if they do. Some older people too through no fault of their own have to meet certain obligations which require more revenue than come from the average pension cheque. These are good arguments against compulsory retirement but, from the national standpoint, there is one much more important. This is the loss to the country in experience and brains when everyone is forced out to pasture at what is still far short of old age.

There was a time when I thought our location here was ideal midway between Toronto, Hamilton and Guelph. But now I am not so sure not when Toronto and Hamilton continue on fast time, with this district automatically following suit, although to the north of us towns and cities have reverted to standard time. You people in those districts don't know how lucky you are. Some of the farmers around here say they would like to send those two fellows—Messrs. Saunders and McCallum out for the cows in the morning and see how they would like wandering over the fields peering into the darkness trying to catch a glimpse of anything resembling a cow. And to think such a state of affairs will continue until almost the end of November with hardly a soul really in favour of the measure. Although I am quite sure nearly every one would take it on the chin if they felt any good were accomplished. As to that we have yet to be convinced. Certainly more power will be used in the country on fast time than standard.

Oh well, I suppose we shall live through it and be none the worse—except for a few frayed nerves and temporarily lost cows. There are worse things than that in life—and also thank goodness, better things to occupy our time and thoughts. Worse things—like the accidental bombing of British troops by American forces—that was too dreadful to think about. Better things—well, there are a lot of better things all the time, wherever you live and wherever you look. An-ropos of better things, I have read or heard it said, that you can pretend or she does in his or her leisure time. That I believe is more or less true. How often we hear—"Oh young Mrs. Saunders will never amount to anything—she spends all her time reading paper-back novels!" Or—"I don't know how Roy puts up with it... all his wife thinks about is her bridge parties!" Then of course we have the young husband who spends most of his time in the pool-room—or the beer-parlour and the older man who is so involved with social organizations that his wife hardly sees him at all.

But on the other side of the ledger we have men and women who restrict their social activities to what they can accomplish without sacrificing family life and who occupy their spare time with skill and ingenuity—only sometimes it is only the small circle in which they live that knows of their accomplishments.

This I realised last Thursday when I attended a local Hobby Show sponsored by the IODE. There was leathcraft, dolls made from shells, ceramics, needlecraft, rug, beautiful pictures in oils, water colours and shells. Jewellery made of metal, wood-carving, model aeroplanes and railways, and an exhibit of articles made by the blind.

To add to the attraction a well-known florist gave a demonstration on flower arrangements that was fascinating to watch. What intrigued me was her foundation—not a pin-bowl to hold the flower stalks, but evergreens. Just common or garden evergreens—cedar and balsam—which she crushed in her hand and pressed firmly down into the bowl. Into this mass of green she later pushed her flowers stems. By this, she explained, flowers could be placed at any angle—and stay put. You might like to try it sometime.

So that was the Hobby Show—but to me it was not so much an exhibit of hobbies as a demonstration of what can be done in a person's spare time.
