Ginger Farm

Written Specially for the Acton Free Press by Gwendolise F. Clarke

Since last week there is only one thing to say about the weather... just that it's worse. 'Nuff said, especially as it's snowing.

One day last week, tired of waiting for a good day, I went to Toronto—in the rain. I paddled around with rubbers and an umbrella most of the day, had lunch "where all Toronto meets" and then, tired of shopping, I visited my in-laws in the Moore Park district. To get there I took a Mount Pleasant bus and went along the new speedway that was opened last year. Speedway is right. It took only ten minutes to go from Adelaide to Inglewood Drive. When I got off the bus I stood for a minute watching the cars go by. The pace was terrific. Time was when I didn't mind driving in the city at all—even when we had the old Model A—now I drive halfway and board a bus.

Before leaving for home I stopped off at Daughter's place. I wanted to hear all the news as just recently she changed her job. Now she is in a publishing office. Last Friday she was really thrilled. The girls in the office she was leaving clubbed together and gave her an electric tea-kettle and two lovely cups and saucers. I am sure she felt she was leaving good friends behind her. Maybe she had a few regrets... I don't know. But that's the way of life—if we gain in one way we lose in another. That, too, was our feeling the night the budget was made public. Actually by paying taxes we appear to be losing, but if higher taxes are a means to greater national and international security then we gain in the long run. Even the budget had its funny side—everyone on their toes to hear the highlights—and then the MacArthur affair stole the show. Even the return of the Stone of Scone was somewhat of an anti-climax and failed to create much excitement.

The only thing new around Ginger Farm is another calf—and being of the male variety it won't be there very long. The visitors we were expecting this week-end got as far as Toronto—and stayed there. Which is what I advised them to do when they telephoned—they had other friends to visit anyway. I knew they were coming up again in a few weeks time—and surely by then there will be some improvement in the weather.

A nice heart-warming little incident came my way yesterday. At a small bus terminal I was buying an evening paper. There was another woman there chattering away excitedly in broken English and pointing to some little magazines on the paper rack. Thinking she could not make herself understood I offered to help. "No, no, it is not that," she answered. "The English I understand—I am four years in Canada. It is the books—the price they do not know. From Holland, you understand—in the Dutch. The surprise—it so pleases me. I never thought to see them here!" And she hugged the two little magazines tightly in her arms.

Two papers from the Old Country. I imagined her taking them home—to her Canadian home. Reading, laughing, perhaps crying over them just a little. How wonderful that the printed word can bridge the gap between two countries, even though oceans divide. Sometimes this love of one's country is a little hard for Canadian-born people to understand. It is also hard to explain. Let us put it this way. A girl marries; she is happy and very much in love with her new home. But underneath it all there is still a deep and abiding love for the home of her childhood—where she grew from childhood to womanhood; where the dreams of yesterday slowly merged into reality of today. So it is with Canadians born in some other land beyond the seas. Now they have two loyalties—the old and the new. Their new home is Canadian—their work, their friends and amusements, even the food they eat, is Canadian—and most of them are happy that it should be so. But it isn't reasonable to suppose the old home, and the old country can, or should be forgotten—that ties can be severed without a backward glance, even though the only contact left is through family letters, the home-town paper or magazines that give news and pictures of old familiar places. Don't grudge these new Canadians their memories—

Fashion Hint

Rainy weather... these days it's never certain which coat we should wear, with the winter one too warm, the shorties too short and other coats often too light. For those who invest in a raincoat a very striking one is of plaid material that will be the perfect answer to April's temperamentally. The black collar and cuffs give dainty formality while the rest of the coat falls in swinging folds that will keep off the raindrops most efficiently. If small packages are getting wet, pop them in the large pockets. The owner of a coat like this will be singing in the rain from now on!

happy or tragic, they are memories of home. To cherish them will make them better, happier, and more real.

Book note. Just off the press—"Manitoba Roundabout" by Lyn Harrington. An excellent book—historical and modern, authentic, and enjoyable. Just the book to give that friend of yours who hails from Winnipeg. He, or she, will say "thank you"—and mean it!

In the ten years from 1930 to 1940 Canada's output of electric energy increased by 50 per cent.
