Indians Instruct In Child Raising

The American Indian had much to teach us about rearing children to live free, useful, well-adjusted lives, says Mr. Sandes in the Reader's Digest. Miss Sandes grew up near a Sioux reservation in South Dakota, and is the author of two books on Indians.

No punishing hand is raised against the Indian boy, yet he learns discipline early. Indian children do not cry, nor make more than a whimper at the greatest hurt. The reason Indian mothers shut off the first cry of the newborn and as often after that as necessary. This teaches the most important lesson of old Indian life. No person can be permitted to endanger the people; no cry must guide a skulking enemy to the village nor spoil a hunt that might mean the winter's meat for a tribe.

Indians who have seen white parents whip their children in anger consider the whites a brutal people who treat their children like enemies who must be bribed or punished or coddled. They believe that children so treated will grow up dependent and immature, and subject to fits of uncontrolled anger within the family circle. They point to the increasing lawlessness and violence of our young people, so often against their elders, a thing unheard of among the Indians.

The redskin has always avoided any overprotection of the young. When the Indian boy crawls, no one cries, "No, no!" and draws him back from the enticing red of the fire. "One must learn from the bite of the flame to let it alone."
