Makes Windbreak

Comparative results of three years' investigations at the Forest Nursery Station, Indian Head, Sask., indicated that proper mulching of trees may be a satisfactory method of establishing windbreaks, spaced 4 x 4 feet, under certain prairie conditions.

Data obtained during the growing seasons of 1949, 1950 and 1951 indicated that mulching of trees grown since 1942 at the Station, in belts 4 x 4 feet, tended to increase the water content of twigs. This would increase their possibility of escaping drought injury. The effect of mulches appeared to be more pronounced during seasons with subnormal amount of precipitation. During the relatively dry periods of each growing season a greater amount of available moisture, and a lower temperature, were found in the surface soil of the root areas of trees under mulch as compared with those not mulched. This would suggest that the increased water content of twigs taken from trees that were mulched, could to a considerable extent, be due to the insulating effect of mulch and is preventive influence from excessive losses of moisture by evaporation. The possibility is not overlooked market and it's a pleasure to give that mulches may also moderate excessive absorption of water by root meat and potatoes for a fresh systems because of possible poorer, aeration of soil.

Results of these investigations have also indicated that the effects collar, bracelet length sleeves and pronounced following more pro- ly attractive in navy, with accessorlonged and lighter application of les a spring tent of lemon yellow. artificial mulch as compared to soft pink or ever-popular white. heavier application but of shorter duration.

It is of considerable importance to note that no evidence was found to indicate that the various mulch treatments delayed the maturity of
