Allergies Caused By Weeds, Mind

Each year millions of people pull out their handkerchiefs and with weeping eyes and running noses, with sniffles and with sneezes, herald in the hay fever season. Hay fever is probably the most common form of allergy, a condition in which a person reacts in a hypersensitive manner to certain substances. These allergy-producing factors are called allergens.

There seems to be about as many allergens as there are sensitive people.

Allergies may be caused by certain foods, house dust, pet animals, feathers, cosmetics, bleaches, dyes, and even heat, cold and sunlight. There is the case of a man who divorced his wife because he developed an acute allergy to her.

The plight of the allergic person was for a long time neglected by medical science.

It was not until 1903 that the theory was put forward that the form which the allergy takes is closely related to the mechanism by which the body develops immunity to certain infectious diseases.

The mind can play an important part in turning an apparently healthy person into an allergy sufferer.

In some cases, such as certain types of asthma, emotional disturbances may be the prime cause of allergic attacks.

Fortunately, doctors can usually bring relief to sufferers.

Once the specific allergens is known, treatment sometimes consists of simply eliminating and avoiding that particular substance. Or, doctors may actually give sufferers injections of minute doses of the allergen and, by gradually increasing the dose, build up the patient's tolerance to it. In addition, drugs which counteract the effects of histamine may be used.

The day may not be far away
