Museum, Sanctuary, Park Site, Dam Seen By Conservationists

Accommodated in chartered buses, officials and guests of the Grand Valley Conservation Authority made an interesting tour last week. The morning program included a visit to the Mack museum and bird sanctuary near Eden Mills, the chief points of interest of the projected 140 acre Rockwood Park development, reforestation areas en route to Fergus and Elora Gorge Park.

The afternoon tripping included the Authority's 400 acre park south of the river at Elora and, on the journey west of Elora, a stop for witnessing the process of tree planting in one of the sections of the Authority's reforestation projects. Operations in connection with the advancing construction of the Conestoga Dam north of Glen Allan were inspected.

It was learned that when completed, the lake north of the actual dam construction will have an area of 120 square miles. On the whole, it will be comparable in size to the Shand Dam project, but particulars were given respecting variations encountered in different riverbeds and area characteristics.

As advised by construction camp officials, serious delays have resulted due to weather conditions, including wrecking storms, one of which carried away a Bailey bridge. With hoped for favorable future weather in the summer and autumn months, the information was given the tourists that there was full expectation that the whole project would reach completion before the end of November.

The picturesque river, mill-dam and wooded beauty of the proposed Eramosa park area at Rockwood proved a revelation to those unfamiliar with those scenes, as did the features of H. C. Mack's bird sanctuary and the museum there. In the museum were seen highly varied collections of Indian lore including arrow-heads, as well as firearms, horned heads of animals, snake-skins, of which one was a python over 12 feet long. The collection includes as well notable pieces of carved ivory from Africa and numerous other items.
