Canned Whale Meat Tried as Mink Food

Vancouver, (CP)—Canned whale meat may reduce production costs for British Columbia's $1,000,000 animal mink industry.

Dr. A. J. Wood, director of the University of British Columbia animal depot, says the canning process could eliminate costly spoilage losses resulting from present use of fresh or frozen meat.

In Washington state recently 7,000 mink died overnight from botulism caused by spoilage, he said.

"Mink are expensive to raise because they are meat-eaters. The animals are fed wet feed which may include whale meat, fish, liver, poultry by-products and animal fat."

"Mink diets read like a hospital chart. The animals must be fed balanced diets because the quality of the pelt can be influenced through nutrition."

Dr. Wood will know the result of his experiment in November and December when minks are pelted for the market.

"If our pelt bring good prices and marketing the canned meat is feasible, we may be able to can next year's whale catch."
