TELEPHONE BY CANDLELIGHT

Talking with a young friend of mine not too long ago, 1,. was asked how it is that during a power failure the telephone continues to work. The lad was excited and pleased one day when all the lights went out in his neighbourhood, and wanted to share his glee with another lad across town. But he was frustrated because he thought the telephone wouldn't work either.

However, on picking up the phone, he was amazed to find that it DID work. This led him to assume that the telephone company has a separate power supply.

Well, we do, and we don't! Like everyone else, we depend on commercial power, and commercial power keeps your telephone working day in, day out, just as it does your lights. But telephone service is vital, and so all our exchanges - including Acton of course # have standby power sources in case of emergency. The instant our equipment detects a power fallure, it switches onto reserve battery power that can keep the exchange operating for many hours. And diesel-driven emergency generators are kept in readiness at strategic points throughout our territory to be brought in immediately to keep any exchange operating indefinitely.

Power failures are very infrequent these days, but severe storms, construction accidents, etc. can and do cause disruptions every once in a while. Though these are usually short lived - thanks to the diligence and public spirit of the power commission employees - it is still reassuring (and sometimes even romantic) to be able to "telephone by candlelight."

THOSE CRANKY GOOD OLD DAYS

Some people like to reminisce about the "good old days" and how much better things were then. I wonder if they remember how much cranking it took to get those good old days started! You cranked the car, the clothes wringer, the gramophone . . . and the telephone. And they tell me that after you placed a Long Distance call, you had to wait an average of nearly eight minutes before you got your party.

Today, of course, it's flick a switch here, press a button there - a sort of "instant action" way of doing things. And as far as Long Distance goes, you can telephone all the way to the Atlantic or Pacific coasts, have a nice little chat, and then be off the phone in Jess time than it would have taken you to get started way back when. And for five or six times less the cost in those days!

Could it be that the "good old days" required so much have the time they take today to think of how "bad" things
