Snow seen through a camera lens transforms our town

The first fall of snow in the streets of the town brightens up fall days heavy with rain. The sombre colors of late autumn are covered by flakes, none of which are alike. It is hard to conceive that the trillions of snowflakes, like fingerprints, are not duplicated in nature's scheme of things.

The Free Press photographer found the town took on a new appearance when the first mantle of winter fell. Trees took on a new look against the brilliant white, their branches caressing tiny flakes and holding them on bare limbs. For some the snow heralded a long winter of cold and they shivered after a look out of frosted windows.

Children greeted the white blanket cheerfully, visions of sleighs and toboggans whizzing down hills, crowding out lesser thoughts.

Soon the flakes will pile high into banks as the long Canadian winter grips the country. But with winter here, can Spring be far behind?
