By Wendy Thomson

Every night last spring, when I opened the front door to let the cats in or out, there would be a wild screaming flurry as seven geese were startled awake. Every morning, my nine year old Jim would have to go out with a shovel to clear away the products of their alarm before somebody stepped in it. Most days, as soon as the sky started to lighten, the little band would march next door to see what had grown overnight that they could finish-off.

The daffodils all met a sad end, as likely did countless other things that were obvious only to beady goose eyes. We hadn't planted a garden, since the year before the geese had either nipped-off what was sprouting or pulled up what had managed to get past the sprout stage.

This year, Mr. Arnett next door had planted all sorts of yummy things, and the geese were bound they were going to pull up all the potatoes to see if there was something in the other end. Every morning it was to be a watching game, after Mr. Arnett left at six, I would sit in bed and read while the flock sat outside the window which was low enough that the gander could raise his head every now and then to peer in to see what I was doing.

If I happened to go back to sleep or left the room, they would be off like a shot over the hills and under the fence. I'd have to slip on a sweater and running shoes, hitch up my pink nightgown and go tearing after them, sprightly springing over the wet weeds like some kind of nut. I'm glad we didn't have people living across the road where they could see me. "Oh, loo, Mummy! There's that Mrs. Thomson doing a May-Dance around her hydro pole!"

What must have been doubly insulting to the Arnetts, once the geese had pulled up the garden, the gander would climb onto the flower bed and scream into the bedroom window. Imagine being woken at six by a full blast from a goose only four or six feet away!

This particular one, our Papa-geese, was hatched by the Lynch's in their house and lived in there for a short while. After that, he always had a "thing" about houses and would march in whenever he got the chance.

Except for that, most of the year he was anti-social and behaved as a goose usually does, chasing everything in sight. He had me up on the hood of the car more than once, and one day I came back from town to find what was to be a hilarious sight. Moyra McDuff, a friend from Oakville, had come to visit. She was on the front steps, her arms full of parcels, dancing from foot to foot, hollering "Ow, Ow Wow!!!" as the gander bit her ankles. I sat and laughed, and Moyra has never forgiven me.

Papa-geese did have another side, though. Come spring, his thoughts turned to nesting, but since he was house-hatched he wasn't too sure whether he was goose or people. After getting Mama-geese settled down, he'd

EMO runs course

Some 20 members of the Oakville Branch of the Canadian Red Cross Society participated recently in a special one-day course in emergency welfare.

Given by the Emergency Welfare Services Division, Department of National Health and Welfare at the request of the Halton County Emergency Measures Organization and the Department of Social and Family Services, Government of Ontario, the course covered the organization and operation of a registration and inquiry service designed to reunite families scattered during an emergency.

Registration and inquiry, explained the course leader Jack Anderson of the Department of National Health and Welfare, is one of the five welfare services which are vital in emergencies.

Training courses for all emergency welfare services are available from the federal government, he explained. Their purpose is to create, across the country, cadres of trained leaders who, augmented by locally recruited teams of helpers, would be able to operate these welfare services in the event of an emergency.

Jim Gray, Director of Welfare Services for Halton County said the need for a registration and inquiry service was well demonstrated in last August's hurricane which demolished the campsite of 2,400 Boy Scouts attending an international jamboree at Kelso and which resulted in the boys being widely scattered throughout the area.

A similar opinion of the course was expressed by Bruce McGregor, EMO Co-ordinator for Halton County. He said, "The setting up of efficient registration and inquiry procedures is an essential service in a disaster. I hope this course is just the beginning of similar things in which other voluntary organizations will participate, particularly in the Burlington, Milton, Acton and Georgetown areas."
